We feel that we should speak of deductions from wages rather than contributions. In other words, these resources are the workers' resources, and therefore it is their right to manage and control them. How is this possible, though, especially in those countries where freedom of association is forbidden or exists in a distorted form? Social security is linked to the whole concept of trade union freedoms, freedom of association and social justice. If there are no real trade union organizations, it is impossible to develop jointly social security strategies, and resources deducted from the workers' wages would then be under the management and control of others.

An important item on the agenda of this Conference concerns part-time work, which is closely linked to social insurance. With part-time work we lose capital as regards acquired experience, and the loss of permanent jobs increases with negative repercussions on economic growth, depriving the social security funds of important and necessary financial resources while increasing their expenses.

Part-time work does not make it possible for workers to be members of trade union organizations. This is another means of violating the rights of workers and weakening union activities. To be a member of a trade union association means that there has to be continuity in one's work and in the union's struggle.

We at the General Union of Algerian Workers are struggling and have struggled in the past to ensure that there are strong, representative and democratic trade unions which may be true and full partners in economic and social life, so that they may contribute to the creation of a strong economy, taking into consideration social differences whilst maintaining purchasing power and jobs in the long term.

A large number of factors lead to the concern and disquiet we feel about the future of the trade union movement as an economic and social partner in society. The General Union of Workers of Algeria believes that trade union rights and freedoms are indivisible and cannot be separated from the basic rights and freedoms of man. Democracy, pluralism, concertation efforts, the right to work and to participation form an indivisible whole, although these principles are now in the service of the so-called new order, and used for the implementation of a particular policy. We have seen and witnessed the violation of the rights and freedoms of trade unions and societies as a whole, where trade unionists suffer oppression, harassment and deportation. We believe that the ILO should do everything possible to preserve workers' rights and to apply universally its principles in a world where balance has been broken, where other international organizations have perhaps strayed from their objectives and where there are two sets of rules applicable in line with the interests of certain parties.

The new international order is supposed to be applied in all the economies of the world with a view to encouraging development, social and economic prosperity and the well-being of all peoples and countries. This means that the economies of the developing and the developed countries must be interdependent, and fair. The industries of the developed countries depend on the raw materials exported from the developing countries just as they depend on consumption by the developing countries of their products and on local and migrant labour. If all these elements are not taken into account, including the issue of migrant workers and the problems of those countries which export manpower, when economic policies are being drawn up, then the new order is condemning itself to fail. It will not be sufficient to blame the deterioration of the situation on migrant workers.

Workers and peoples are still living under oppression. We demand the lifting of the embargo against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, particularly since that country has presented directly or through the League of Arab States reasonable proposals which could lead to solutions to the differences which exist between it and the Western countries. Is it possible to continue to impose this embargo on national and foreign workers?

We also call for a lifting of the embargo imposed on Iraq. We are not defending a particular regime or a particular policy. But no one has the right to impose hunger and sickness on an entire people, particularly since the reasons for this embargo have now disappeared.

It is a strange society which accepts the slow death being imposed on Iraq and yet which stands back as a spectator before the genocide of the workers in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Palestine. Finally, we would like to reiterate here our solidarity with the workers and the peoples of South Africa and of the world as a whole, against segregation, racism and exclusion and on behalf of the rights and freedoms of man in the search for a better life.

Original Arabic: Mr. DEGOL (Government delegate, Eritrea) – Allow me to present the greetings of the Government and people of Eritrea. It is a great honour for us to participate for the first time in the work of the International Labour Conference and we address our heartiest thanks to the International Labour Office and to the Director-General for all the facilities offered to our delegation to enable it to participate in the Conference. We also congratulate the President of this session on his well-deserved election and wish him every success in his directing of our work.

Our Government commits itself to respecting the standards of the ILO in our new independent State of Eritrea.

We have achieved this great success of independence after a difficult struggle which lasted some 50 years, including 30 years of armed conflict, when our people were able to meet the challenge of liberating their national soil and proceeding to a process of democratization. Thus we have acquired at great cost the right to sovereignty and freedom.

Our country, Eritrea, has experienced harsh conflicts for our national liberation and after all the destruction and degradation we have started to organize our safety, administration and social life. We have already started drafting legislation to resolve the problems of economic and social life. We are already applying legislation to protect the rights of workers and all other social categories.

Today we are an independent and stable country which has already established friendly relations with all its neighbouring countries, including with Ethiopia, its former enemy. We are going to work in the interests of all sections of the population to guarantee a life of dignity to all our citizens. Despite our limited resources, in particular as regards industry, we wish to re-establish conditions propitious to a life of dignity. Thus we are going to build a road network, we have developed systems of communication, we have started to build hospitals, but our scarce resources do not enable us at the moment to achieve all our aspirations.

Eritrea hopes that the international community will give it real cooperation so that we can reconstruct everything that was demolished by such a long war.

Original French: Mr. DJIBRINE (Workers' delegate, Chad) – It is with real pleasure that I join my voice to those of the distinguished speakers who preceded me in congratulating the Officers of this Conference on their election. Thanks to their vast experience and personal qualities, I am convinced that they will lead us through our work with competence and efficiency.

We are happy that the theme of social security was included among the subjects for debate at this year's session. Indeed, even if it is customary to find in each of our States a system of social security and social protection which offers workers and their families the possibility of protecting themselves against numerous social risks while simultaneously guaranteeing them all income when they are no longer of working age, there are nevertheless many disparities among our countries.

In my country, Chad, all those working in the public service, whether employees or public servants, are excluded from the system. Nevertheless, 5 per cent of their wage is deducted for old-age pension and survivors' benefit. However, since these deductions are not placed in a separate account, but in the public treasury, they are automatically used by the State for its operational needs. Thus, despite the small number of retired civil servants and other beneficiaries, the State is unable to pay them the full benefit to which they are entitled. Since 1979 they have received, on average, one-fourth of their benefit.

If, as we have seen, the fate of state workers is deplorable, that of workers in the semi-public sector or the private sector is not much better. There are tremendous inadequacies there.

First of all, there is the question of health care. In the whole country there are only three medical and social centres which provide care for school-age children.

As regards family allowances, the National Social Welfare Fund (CNPS) in Chad pays beneficiaries the sum of 600 francs CFA, that is to say, 3 Swiss francs a month. A carton of milk costs 1,600 francs, or 8 Swiss francs.

The most disquieting phenomenon, however, which may eventually bankrupt the CNPS, is the President of the Republic's regular practice of withdrawing its funds. The funds withdrawn since the ancien régime up to this day represent some 2 million Swiss francs. This is absolutely scandalous because not only does the State pay no subsidies to the social security fund, but it has turned it into a real racket.

My intention in reporting these facts was merely to give you an idea of the gravity of the situation.

It is obvious that such a system creates adverse repercussions for the living conditions of the workers and their families. But that is the least of the evils facing Chadian workers.

First of all, wages are ridiculously low. Indeed, the minimum guaranteed wage, which has not changed since 1978, is 8,320 francs CFA per month, that is to say, a little less than 42 Swiss francs. It is quite impossible to live today on this income, not only for a family, but even for a single, childless individual.

The Government, after having invoked economic difficulties to justify its refusal to increase the minimum guaranteed wage, now invokes the constraints imposed by the International Monetary Fund within the framework of the structural adjustment programme.

Wage-earners find it very difficult to survive; public servants are living what can be described as a real Calvary. When we left Chad for Geneva, public servants in the capital were still waiting for four and five months of back wages; those in the provinces for up to 12 months of back wages!

It is for this reason, among others, that last year the Federation of Trade Unions of Chad had to call for strikes.

We were also calling for the setting up of a democratic regime because the workers really had reached a stage of absolute frustration and exasperation because of a dictatorship set up by armed men whose barbarism was exceeded only by their incompetence to govern.

Indeed, all those who have governed our country since 1979 have only been concerned about enriching themselves at the expense of the people. They have made it a speciality to maintain a state of war and insecurity to retain their power. Unfortunately, there have always been so-called friendly States to provide them with support and aid.

As I was saying, it was to fight against all these ills that we were forced to call for strike action throughout 1992. There was considerable response to these calls for strikes and the Government then accused us of being subversive and wishing to destabilize institutions. As a consequence steps were taken against the workers using methods more appropriate to Fascist regimes, assassinations, arrests, dismissals, the banning of activities of the UST, and the occupation of its premises by the police.

In short, human and trade union rights were never so frequently violated as in 1992.

However, during this period, we gratefully received the support of many workers from around the world, and I would particularly like to mention in this connection the ICFTU, OATUU, CFDT, CGT-FO, the Labour Congress of Canada, and the AFL-CIO.

On behalf of the men and women workers in Chad I would like to express my thanks to these organizations, and to all the others that I cannot mention here, for their support and assistance. I express our thanks and our deep gratitude.

As was underlined by the Minister of the Public Service and Labour, the Government of Chad has finally agreed to organize a national conference with the aim of seeking ways and means of lifting the country out of this deep generalized crisis in which it finds itself, and to lay the basis for a constitutional State in a process of democratization.

I am happy to emphasize that this important national conference was well chaired by Mr. Adoum Maurice Hel-Bongo, an official who worked for 26 years at the International Labour Office before his merited retirement. Thanks to his excellent and skilled chairmanship the conference adopted several interesting decisions. Certain transitional bodies have been established with a view to solving socio-economic problems, establishing peace and security and guiding the country through a process of democratization, including the establishment of freely elected and democratic institutions.

Having taken an active part in this national conference, our Federation voluntary observed a social truce in the hope that the transitional Government would relatively rapidly find solutions to the most urgent problems, that is to say, the lifting of arbitrary sanctions imposed on workers; the partial payment of wages in arrears; a revision of the legal status of trade unions; the adoption of a new Labour Code and Social Security Code, parts of which have been awaiting action since 1988.

What is most important to us is that the process of establishing democracy should come to fruition. But two months after the conclusion of our national conference, we are being to have serious doubts as regards the intentions of the President of the Republic and his Prime Minister as regards the application of the decisions taken at that conference.

That is why we do not preclude the possibility of undertaking renewed trade union action in order to oblige them to respect the commitments they made. We hope that we shall be able to count on all of you, and the ILO in particular, in our struggle to obtain democracy and social justice.

Original French: Mr. SENE (accompanying the Minister of Labour, Senegal) – On behalf of the Head of State of Senegal, President Abdou Diouf, the Acting President of the Organization of African Unity, and on behalf of Senegal, I would like to say how proud we are to see a worthy son of Africa elected to be President of this session of the prestigious International Labour Conference.

It is a pleasant duty both to address to you my warm congratulations and to pay tribute to your country, Egypt, which has inherited a glorious African civilization which has contributed greatly to the struggle for human dignity, the construction of peace and progress of modern history. Your country is preparing to host the Summit Conference of the Heads of State and Government of the OAU and at the same time you are directing the work of the International Labour Conference at a decisive turning-point in the history of this Organization.

In fact the ILO, the matrix of the social conscience of humanity, has undergone a change in defining its programmes which has been helped by the disappearance of the ideological antagonisms which used to influence its work.

I should also like to seize this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General for the remarkable work that he has done at the head of the International Labour Office.

The Director-General's Report describes, if there were any need, a problem which addresses both governments and social partners and challenges them to define and implement a balanced social policy at a time when the economic environment is continually worsening.

There is no doubt that the definition of a social policy is closely linked with the economic capacity of a country and the programming of a social insurance and protection system can only acquire its full significance when it is integrated into the macroeconomic objectives of the country.

For developing countries the real challenge at the moment is how to regulate occupational risks in our industrial policies and how to re-establish a balance in the financing of our social security systems.

This objective appears unfortunately to be challenged by the drastic sacrifices forced on us by the economic recession and the resulting structural adjustment policies.

There is no doubt that this situation, which is harmful to the implementation of our employment policy which underpins the financing of our social security policy lays more and more of a burden on our imaginations to achieve a balance between contributors and beneficiaries.

As the Director-General has quite rightly stressed, the social security systems of our countries are faced with a double problem. First, the reduction of resources in the face of a runaway increase in expenditure. Second, there is the non-universal nature of protection, the result of which is the non-coverage of the majority of our people.

Various solutions have been contemplated to redress the balance and in Senegal we have considered increasing resources by revaluing contributions.

We have also undertaken a reform of the management of social security institutions by separating the functions of the State and from those of the agencies, which has meant strengthening the authority and the supervisory means of employers and of the insured.

In this way the tripartite authorities exercise effective monitoring of the institutions to ensure that they are managed more effectively.

However, in spite of the efforts of the Government, it would be desirable to think of long-term solutions in a global context, both at the level of the undertaking and by increasing the number of contributors.

This means that one of our concerns is to find some machinery that will better organize the informal sector so as to give it social coverage.

In other words, it is a question of innovatory policies that would encourage participation of decentralized communities, thanks to a social providence system. The complementary social providence approach being considered by Senegal as regards state agents would fall into this framework.

The stabilization of costs requires the implementation of a policy for the prevention of occupational risks. This is why our country intends to extend occupational medicine to the whole country in parallel with therapeutic medicine and to set up joint safety and health committees in each enterprise, representing employers and workers.

In fact it is a question of imagining a participatory policy for risk management involving the government, employers and workers in respect of the fundamental policy of tripartism.

Beyond these very limited national solutions we must develop an impetus of international solidarity, through technical cooperation within our Organization, and through bilateral cooperation with our foreign friends and partners.

This cooperation should be based on a well thought-out partnership based on the needs expressed by the developing countries, and it should be integrated into their social policies.

It could also help with retraining in countries where this need is becoming ever-more pressing in view of technological developments and the new risks to which they give rise.

Finally, I would like to say that our delegation and our country would like to repeat here their commitment to spare no effort to help the ILO in achieve the objectives described in the framework of the Director-General's Report.

Original Russian: Mr. SCHERBAKOV (representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions) – First of all may I associate myself with all the previous speakers and congratulate the President on his election to his post, and express the conviction that he will successfully carry out his mission.

Our delegation is for the first time representing at the International Labour Conference an international trade union association that was reformed a little more than a year ago – the General Confederation of Trade Unions which includes the national trade union confederations of eight independent States and more than 40 international trade union associations of a branch of industry.

At present, the GCTU has more than 97 million members. The Governing Body of the ILO showed its appreciation of the significance of the organization by giving it regional advisory status in the European region. The importance and timeliness of the subject of the Director-General's Report cannot be overestimated. We fully agree with the statement in the Report, that "Access to social protection is a basic human right, as well as a measure of human welfare".

In fact, the presence of a broad-based and well-founded system of social protection covering most workers strengthens the labour resources of a country, reinforces its potential for economic development and for carrying out reforms, and helps to stabilize its political and social situation.

The transition of the countries of our region from a centrally planned to a market economy poses most acutely the question of maintaining a reliable and comprehensive system of social protection for workers and their families.

Currently, working people are less and less able fully to realize their right to work, there is rising inflation and a sharp increase in the number of workers who have no social protection. In the context of the reforms carried out in our countries, there are more and more attempts by employers and some government circles to speed up the introduction of insurance-based health care, to scrap the present system of social insurance and social security, and to exclude trade unions from involvement in its management. In many States, government reform programmes are clearly moving towards a reduction in social protection, are cutting back on financing and are not including state guarantees of social support for workers who may need it. There is a threat to citizens' rights to health care, free medical care, and adequate social security to cover old age, illness, invalidity and other cases set out in the Constitution of our States.

In these new social and economic conditions, trade unions are constantly searching for more effective ways and means of influencing the social policy of governments. As advocates of a constructive and business-like dialogue with their social partners, trade unions are trying to draft and ensure the adoption of instruments which provide proper protection for workers in accordance with the particular situation facing each individual State.

The setting up of standing inter-State bodies of the CIS countries is enabling our Confederation to participate actively and directly in defining States' positions on social protection and workers' health care problems.

An example of this is the inter-Governmental agreement to guarantee pension rights for retired persons, thus providing a solution to one of the most serious problems, that is, maintaining social guarantees for millions of people.

So as to protect the social and economic interests and rights of the workers, the GCTU has worked out and submitted to the interparliamentary assembly of the CIS a charter of citizens' social rights and guarantees. Based on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and ILO standards, the charter has become the basic recommendatory document for Parliament and governments when drafting social legislation.

The ILO's standard-setting activity in respect of social protection provides a solid basis for the work of the trade unions. However, as correctly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, given the new social and economic situations in many countries of the world, the promotion of social protection "will require normative actions – on the part of governments, the social partners and the ILO – as well as technical assistance concerning the structure and development of the schemes themselves".

Of course, it is regrettable that the ILO Conventions on social protection have been ratified by so few States. We hope that the discussion of this problem at this session of the Conference will encourage a more active implementation of ILO standards.

We are grateful to the ILO for the enormous and practical help given to the trade unions of our region in their efforts to defend the social rights of workers. In the past few years, seminars and symposia, and recommendations and conclusions on draft legislation have made a valuable contribution to setting up social protection systems. I hope that in the future this assistance will be continued and extended.

In the report on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation it is correctly pointed out that the changes taking place in Central and Eastern Europe are confronting the ILO with new problems, and forcing it to "respond to the needs of societies now striving to reform their labour relations systems in accordance with democratic values". We welcome the determination of the leadership of the ILO to reform its structure and tasks and adapt it to the new needs of a changing world. The creation of multidisciplinary groups and the drawing up of clear priorities all bring the ILO closer to the needs of its member States and makes it more effective.

A significant role in strengthening the influence and authority of the ILO in the world trade union movement will be played by upholding the principle of universality and representativity in the executive committees of all trade union movements. Our organizations are prepared to work in cooperation with the ILO and are convinced that such collaboration is in the interests of working people. This is vitally important for us at this time when our countries are carrying out reforms of labour legislation and reviewing labour relations.

Original Spanish: Mrs. CHIRENO (representative of the World Federation of Clerical Workers) – I would like to express my sincere congratulations to the President, on his election to the Chair of this Conference. Mr. Hansenne is also to be congratulated on his re-election to the position of Director-General of the ILO.

The subject of social security is, in the opinion of our World Federation of Clerical Workers, of vital importance and has been the object of detailed analysis and discussion at our last congress organized last year in Santiago, Chile, where we noted the deterioration of social security systems in Latin America. There is little protection and there is much administrative corruption as a result of mismanagement by the various governments, leading to, in practical terms, bankruptcy in many countries of the bodies responsible for the management of social security systems. This fact is invoked in order to justify the inclusion in programmes of adjustment – programmes proposed within the neo-liberal context which has been introduced in this region – of the privatization of social security. It is at present fashionable to discredit our timid steps towards democratization by repeating that the employers are the good guys in this continent, the ones who are the successful managers, they were not the ones largely responsible for all those ills which now exist. In any case, we, the workers, are convinced that we are not the ones responsible. Whether under dictatorships or under democracy to governments, hunger, suffering and marginalization have always been our lot.

Our Federation, at its 27th Congress, therefore spoke out against privatization of social security in Latin America and in other countries because we continue to believe that the best path for social security in order to ensure that it is truly and effectively at the service of the workers is within the context of tripartism, in the search for balance, justice and equality.

The Director-General of the ILO has analysed how in Latin America and in developing countries there has developed a whole army of men and women who form what is known in the ILO and most countries as the informal sector, whom we have decided to call "independent workers", because any other term seems to be prejudicial to those workers, whose sole fault lies in trying to earn their living by honest labour; these workers are now excluded from labour and social legislation in the majority of countries, and from social security coverage, or, as is stated in the Report of the Director-General, are obliged to pay sums which are so high that they are way beyond their means.

If we understand social security as a system able to protect the worker and his family from the cradle to the grave, we also believe that we must unite our efforts in order to achieve a system of social security in the developing countries which is genuinely and effectively accessible to all workers, regardless of the sector where they work. The Director-General's analysis refers to the inadequate pensions paid to retired workers in the developing countries. If these benefits are negligible today the future will be even worse because millions of workers in the developing countries will never be covered by pension schemes, since they are excluded from social security because they belong to the enormous group of independent workers; we must therefore fight to obtain coverage for them.

Our Federation is very concerned by the daily violations of the fundamental rights of workers and we have studied in the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, noting once again that the governments sign and ratify Conventions and then ignore and violate them regularly. In the commercial sector in Latin America, our regional federation, the Federation of Latin American Trade and Allied Workers (FETRALCOS), has conducted a broad campaign in favour of shorter working hours in the commerce sector, where there are constant violations by many of the employers in the region with the complicity of governments. We are continuing our struggle in countries such as Brazil, Chile, Panama and Paraguay, where workers are often obliged to work for 14, 16 or more hours a day without any overtime pay with the consequence that there are limited possibilities for study after their day's work. Moreover, the workers are obliged to work on Sundays, which is a violation of the right to rest and the established standards and Conventions of the ILO as well as of national legislation and Constitutions.

The Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention 1981 (No. 156), which has been examined by the Committee on the Application of Standards Conference, has been ratified by very few governments, only 19 of them throughout the world. Although these responsibilities are borne largely by women, we should not forget that there are men who are widowed or separated and who have also to assume family responsibilities, and these workers do not have any real protection for their children.

If it is difficult during the week to find someone to look after children, it is even more difficult on Sundays or on holidays, so that if one is obliged to work on a Sunday this means the problems of workers with family responsibilities are multiplied.

We have stated that Sunday is a day for workers to rest in the bosom of their families for recreation and relaxation, and for reflection on spiritual matters; it is also a day to ensure that the city can breathe. The pollution in our big cities reduces the possibilities of human survival.

Violations of the Equal Renumeration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), which establish the principle of equality, are the order of the day in developing countries.

We deplore the fact that many women workers in countries such as Brazil, Ecuador, Panama and Paraguay are obliged to present periodical proof of the fact that they are not pregnant in order to keep their jobs, with the serious consequence that very few women dare report such abuses because they fear the loss of their jobs.

There are many workers who religiously pay their social security contributions, but when the time comes for the benefits to be served they do not receive them because the employers deduct the contributions but do not pay them to the social security fund; this is prejudicial to the workers, who remain silent about these abuses for fear of finding themselves in the street without any hope of protection. Protection against unemployment is a dream which rarely comes true in developing countries; even in the few countries where it is provided for by law, the law is rarely, if ever, applied.

Our World Federation feels that there is an urgent need to strengthen actions aimed at ensuring full respect of human rights and labour rights as well as respect of freedom of association and of the right to strike, and respect for maternity.

We hope to see workers, men and women, in the developing countries and throughout the world building up through their efforts the wealth of their nations in a climate of respect, equality, justice and true and effective democracy.

We are concerned about sexual harassment, of which working women at different levels are often the victims and about the marginalization and exclusion of independent workers in commerce. We want to continue to contribute to the construction of a better world where the human dignity of both men and women is paramount. We believe that it is possible to achieve this if politicians, governments, employers and workers – society as a whole in fact – recognizes the value of individuals and learns to respect their rights.

Obviously the employers have to make profits, but this should be without merciless exploitation of the workers.

We offer our efforts and our will to work together to build a new society based on democracy, justice and truth. We face the future with faith and optimism, and we appeal to the conscience of all so that we may work together in solidarity in favour of justice and peace.

Original French: Mr. PULH (representative of the World Movement of Christian Workers) – I want most sincerely to join with other speakers who preceded me in congratulating Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as President of this Conference. I should also like to thank the Director-General and his staff for the opportunity that was extended to us to take part in this Conference. We also would like to congratulate him on his re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO.

The organization that I represent, like the ILO, is very much committed to human, moral and spiritual promotion of human beings. A non-governmental organization that promotes education, training and human development among workers and the general population, our movement has more 3 million members. It is open to all men and women whatever their culture or belief.

Concerned about the current situation affecting millions of workers, we share all the concerns of the ILO in its efforts to establish a social protection system covering all social risks. The basic objective is to protect the dignity of workers and their families.

The Director-General should be congratulated for having made this the topic of his Report to the Conference this year. It comes appropriately at a time when the crisis is demanding more of social protection institutions at the same time that their income is falling.

The global structural crisis cannot be resolved in the short term or by palliative measures.

It is the very organization of society itself that needs to be re-examined in light of the primacy of human beings. Economic measures should be conceived and applied in the service of human beings.

Social protection can no longer be linked only to workers' contributions. As a result of various cumulative factors, the number of contributors is dropping. These factors include spectacular progress in productivity, an extension of periods of study, increased life expectancy and demographic growth. With the exception of this last factor, there is no question of going backwards in relation to the others, despite the way they sometimes manifest themselves; at least in principle, they can be regarded as evidence of real progress.

It would be pretentious and naive to propose a miracle solution, but one can state that the threats to social protection appear mainly when economic protectionism and unbridled liberalism develop in the absence of any significant accompanying social measures.

Even though we welcome the efforts for social protection of the past 50 years, the situation experienced by the large majority of workers is extremely worrying. We would simply state here the example of women migrant workers, workers in the free trade areas. What about child labour which seems to be increasing and which should be repressed and eliminated?

We find ourselves in a situation which is somewhat similar to that which prevailed at the time when the social consequences of the first Industrial Revolution called for the establishment of international labour legislation.

It is more important than ever that the ILO has been, and should remain, the effective instrument for research, development of standards and supervision. The market economy is socially acceptable only if it is part of a national and international legislative framework that guarantees the rights of men and women as of producers, consumers, members at various levels of the human community, but also unique individuals called to realize their own destiny. The standard-setting mission of the ILO thus should be strengthened.

There is an item on the agenda of this session which concerns the development of an international instrument on part-time work. We should like to support this initiative of the ILO to establish such an instrument, and we would like to make our contribution to the discussion.

First, in relation to social protection for part-time workers. In his General Report, the Director-General is quite correctly concerned about the future of social protection. We feel that the threats facing social protection schemes should not be compounded by the spread of part-time work. We have seen that there are too many part-time jobs that are not part of the general social protection scheme, and we would stress that part-time work, however long it lasts, should be covered by the same social protection schemes that apply to workers in regular employment.

We have a second comment to make. We are also concerned about the many threats to the right to work, and we feel that part-time work should be treated in the general context of protection and development of employment. In this respect, the increase in productivity, thanks to human abilities and in particular through new technologies, and the unemployment crisis which has accompanied them, should lead socio-economic and political leaders to consider a different way of distributing work time or even a reduction in normal working hours.

This basic concern to reduce working hours should not be obscured by the need to regulate part-time work, however necessary this might be.

In industrialized countries we have seen an increase in part-time work with loss of job security.

And if part-time work may well meet the aspirations of certain types of workers, above all women, all too often it is imposed by enterprises in the name of greater flexibility of working time.

Moreover, this imposition takes place in the context of work schedules which are incompatible with the interests of workers, that is working on weekends or working evenings or having an obligatory number of working hours per month.

These consequences are serious for workers and their families and upset family life, increase stress and lead to loss of work motivation which is bad for the enterprise as well. Naturally, all of this is part of the concerns of any society, in any economic and social system which is devoted to the welfare of human beings. That is why we firmly support all of the work of the ILO to this end and in particular the Report of the Director General on Social insurance and social protection.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – Before adjourning the sitting I give the floor to Mr. Hamza, Workers' adviser of Iraq, who would like to use his right to reply to the speech made by Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate of Kuwait. Please will you take only two minutes.

Original Arabic: Mr. HAMZA (Workers' adviser, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to exercise my right to reply to the allegations made by the representative of the Kuwaiti regime.

The complaint against my country, Iraq, is unjustified. In this complaint it is said that certain trade unionists, including Ali Al-Kandary, were detained, whereas Mr. Al-Kandary is here with us in this Conference. So this charge is entirely unjustified.

Secondly, regarding the so-called Kuwaiti prisoners of war in Iraq, this question is entirely false. The international organizations such as the ICRC, the United Nations, the League of Arab States and the General Union of Arab Workers – all of these organizations have verified, during their visits to Iraq, there are no Kuwaiti prisoners of war in Iraq.

Thirdly, with respect to freedom of association, there are complaints against the Kuwaiti regime before the Arab Labour Organization. There are also inquiries regarding the rights of Arab workers in Kuwait and the release of Arab workers held in Kuwait.

The representative of the Kuwaiti Government speaks of the so-called Kuwaiti prisoners of war to prolong the embargo against the Iraqi people, an embargo that has gone on for more than 1,000 days and has had a negative impact: thousands of sick Iraqi people have died; factories have not been able to continue to produce and thousands of workers have lost their jobs. This is a violation of human rights and the objectives and principles of the International Labour Organization.

The representative of the Kuwaiti regime is lying before this and other international organizations.

We all know how the daughter of the Ambassador of Kuwait in Washington fooled the world in 1990 with her story of incubators.

Second Report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Poland

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the Workers' delegate of Poland, Mrs. Ewa Spychalska, Chairperson, Polish Trade Union Alliance (OPZZ), presented by Mr. Tomasz Wojcik, member of the Polish Delegation to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. In the List of Delegations, published on 2 June 1993, Mr. Tomasz Wojcik, Member, Presidium of the National Commission; Chairman, "Dolny Slask" Region, NSZZ Solidarnosc; Deputy Member, Governing Body of the ILO, is identified as Workers' adviser and substitute delegate of Poland.

2. Since in accordance with Article 26, paragraph 4(c), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, an objection is not receivable "if the author of the objection is serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken", the Committee declared the objection irreceivable.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic

3. The Committee had before it an objection from the "Union Syndicale des Travailleurs de Centrafrique" (USTC). The objection was signed by Mr. Th. Sonny-Cole, Secretary General of the USTC, and was directed against the nomination as Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic, of a leader of the "Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs de Centrafrique" (CNTC).

4. In the List of Delegates published on 10 June 1993, Mr Théophile Sonny-Cole, Secretary General of the USTC, appeared as Workers' adviser and substitute delegate of the Central African Republic.

5. Since in accordance with Article 26, paragraph 4 (c), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, an objection is not receivable "if the author of the objection is serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken", the Committee declared the objection irreceivable.

Communications concerning the Workers' delegation of the Republic of Korea

6. The Committee had before it two communications sent to the Director-General of the ILO from the Korea Congress of Independent Industrial Trade Union Federations (KCIIF) and from the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ).

7. The communication from the KCIIF referred to the situation in the country concerning freedom of association in the light of the Report on Case No. 1629 of the Committee on Freedom of Association and added that the Ministry of Labour decided to exclude the leaders of independent trade unions from the delegation to the Conference without previously consulting them. The communication from the IFJ referred to the refusal of the Government of the Republic of Korea to recognize the Korean Federation of Press Unions (KFPU) and its decision to exclude leaders of independent trade unions from the Workers' delegation of the Republic of Korea to the Conference.

8. The Committee pointed out that these communications referred in general to questions of freedom of association which were examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body of the ILO, which was the competent organ to deal with these questions and noted that the organizations concerned did not object to the credentials of the Workers' delegate or any of his advisers. In these circumstances, the Committee limited itself to taking note of these communications which did not call for any action on its part.

Communication concerning the Workers' delegate of Congo

9. The Committee had before it a communication concerning the Workers' delegate of Congo from the "Confédération Africaine des Travailleurs Croyants (CATC).

10. The communication referred to the trade union situation following the annulment in 1991 of legislation previously in force which had established a trade union monopoly in favour of the "Confédération Syndicale Congolaise" (CSC). Although the trade union situation continued to be contrary to ILO standards, numerous organizations had been established either as a result of the break-up of the CSC or those recently created and two confederations had emerged, the "Confédération Générale des Cadres et Agents de Maîtrise (CGCAM) of limited vocation by virtue of their "corporatiste" character and the "Confédération Africaine des Travailleurs Croyants" (CATC), which was national and inter-professional. However, since no relevant procedures were provided for evaluating the representativity of the different organizations, no central organization could pretend to be the most representative and to be represented in the tripartite delegation of Congo to the Conference to the exclusion of others.

In such a case, a system of rotation between existing confederations should be established. With respect to the 80th Session of the Conference, the Workers' titular delegate should have been nominated by the CATC.

11. The Committee pointed out that this communication, although it gave certain information on the trade union situation in the country and suggested a procedure for determining the composition of the Workers' delegation, the CATC did not question the credentials of any person accredited in the delegation so that the communication did not constitute an objection. In the circumstances, the Committee limited itself to taking note of the communication which did not require any other action on its part.

Representation of Zaire

12. The Committee continued its examination of the various communications that had been received from different sources appointing delegates and advisers to take part in the delegation to the Conference from Zaire. These communications (in chronological order) took the following forms: credentials, dated 6 May 1993, signed by Mr. Mbumb Musong, under the title of Minister of Labour and Social Security in the "Gouvernement de Transition" headed by Mr. Etienne Tshisekedi, as amended by a subsequent letter of 7 June; credentials, dated 1 June 1993, issued by the Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire to the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies; credentials, dated 4 June 1993, signed on behalf of President Mobutu by Mr. Mpinga Kasenga, who – according to a communication dated 22 April 1993 to the United Nations from the Permanent Mission of Zaire in New York – was the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in the "Gouvernement de Large Union Nationale et de Salut Publique" headed by Mr. Faustin Birindwa.

13. The Committee also had before it information provided by the Office of Legal Affairs of the United Nations in response to the request for advice that had been made on the Committee's behalf (see the Committee's first report, Provisional Record No. 10, p. 10/25, paragraph 4), together with an aide-mémoire and attachments that had been provided by one of the parties concerned. It heard representatives of the two parties claiming to represent the Government of Zaire, as well as the Permanent Representative of Zaire to the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies in Geneva. In addition, the Chairman of the Committee reported on informal discussions that he had had with representatives on both sides.

14. Two issues came to the fore during the hearings. The first concerned the constitutional position as seen by the different parties. The Committee considered, however, that it was not within its competence to judge either the political or the legal weight of the various points made since they involved extremely complex political issues and questions of constitutionality under a national legal system. The second concerned the determination of the authority who was actually acting on behalf of Zaire in the various international forums, including participation in meetings of intergovernmental organizations. In this respect, the Committee felt that the evidence made available at present including, inter alia, the information provided by the United Nations Office of Legal Affairs was insufficient to enable firm conclusions to be made.

15. On the other hand, in accordance with constant practice based on a recommendation of the United Nations General Assembly (operative paragraph 3 of resolution 396 (V) of December 1950) the Committee stressed that the ILO should be guided in this matter by the attitude adopted by the General Assembly where more than one authority claims to be the government of a Member State. However, the Office of Legal Affairs of the United Nations had confirmed that only one set of credentials had been presented for Zaire at the last General Assembly. There was therefore no precedent in the United Nations for the specific situation of the present conflicting claims, and the Office of Legal Affairs had advised that the Committee would have to deal with the matter in accordance with ILO practice.

16. The only precedent which specifically related to the present situation was that of the World Health Assembly, which appeared to have acted on the basis that, having regard to resolution 396 (V) referred to above, reference should be made to the situation in the United Nations General Assembly prior to the recent developments relating to Zaire. In this connection, the Committee noted that the Credentials Committee of the General Assembly when it considered the matter on 8 October 1992 had accepted the credentials issued by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zaire on behalf of President Mobutu. However, at that time the Constitutional Act on which the "Gouvernement de Transition" bases it legality had been in force since 4 August 1992; Mr. Tshisekedi was Prime Minister of Zaire and Mr. Mbumb Musong was Minister for Labour and Social Security, an office which he still holds, according to the "Gouvernement de Transition". His replacement, according to the "Gouvernement de Large Union Nationale", only dated from December 1992. The Committee therefore had doubts as to whether it could base any firm conclusions on the situation at the time of the last session of the General Assembly.

17. In view of the absence of any criteria for determining which of the claimed governments should be recognized, the Committee discussed the possibility of not acting upon any of the communications that had been submitted. It considered, however, that action was required on its part for three reasons: One related to its mandate under the Standing Orders of the Conference which did not provide for the withholding of any credentials. The present problem had been that it could recognize only one set of credentials for each member State and it was not clear which it should accept in the case of Zaire. A related reason was the evident desirability of permitting at least some representatives of Zaire to participate in the work of the Conference as soon as possible.

18. The final reason concerned the position of the Permanent Representative of Zaire. The Committee noted that as a general practice, permanent missions accredited by the United Nations in Geneva are recognized by the ILO as one of the authorities empowered to issue credentials for the International Labour Conference. The present Permanent Representative of Zaire in Geneva had taken up office in October 1988, long before the current political conflict, and his capacity under international law to represent Zaire did not seem to be seriously challenged. While the representatives of the "Gouvernement de Transition" alleged that he had misused his function of representing the State by representing the interests of the President and indicated that the legal procedures for the replacement of ambassadors who had adopted such an attitude had been blocked by the President, they did not provide any evidence that, pending the replacement of the Permanent Representative, he did not have the capacity to perform the acts customarily performed by Permanent Missions, including the issue of credentials. As indicated above, the Committee considered that it had no competence to inquire into whether or not an authority empowered to issue credentials was acting in accordance with the domestic law concerned.

19. The Committee therefore concluded that it had an insufficient basis to act on either the credentials issued on behalf of the "Gouvernement de Transition" or the "Gouvernement de Large Union Nationale et de Salut Publique", but that the credentials issued by the Permanent Mission of Zaire in Geneva should be taken into consideration, on the clear understanding that recognition of those credentials by the Committee or the International Labour Conference did not imply recognition of the government whose representatives were included in those credentials, such recognition being a question for the United Nations General Assembly.

20. Thus, for the purposes of Article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the following are the names of the members of the delegation of Zaire as set out in the above-mentioned credentials:

Government delegates

Mr. Kiswe Maya, Minister of Labour, Manpower and Social Security

Mr. Mutuale Kikanke, Permanent Representative

Advisers

Ms Kirongozi Maliyabwana, Plenipotentiary Minister

Miss Nguz Yav, Secretary

Employers' delegate

Mr. Luboya Diyoka

Workers' delegate

Mr. Ngoma.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

CORRIGENDUM

At the end of Provisional Record No. 13, the statement by Mr. Aly Khalil, Minister of Social Affairs and Labour of the Syrian Arab Republic, exercising his right of reply on behalf of the Arab Group, should read as follows:

"I asked for the floor to exercise the right of reply to what was said by the Government delegate and the Workers' delegate of the United States concerning the reasons which led the Arab Group not to have recourse to the supervisory bodies, in other words to the ILO's usual supervisory machinery, to defend the interests of Palestinian workers and those of other Arab workers in the other occupied Arab territories. My reply is that the Arab Group is not unaware of, does not pretend to be unaware of, and does not transgress this machinery, but respects and abides by its rules. The reasons for not having recourse to this machinery can be summarized as follows:

1. The examination of the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories is, at present, carried out directly, for fundamental objective reasons, by the International Labour Office in accordance with article 10 of the Organization's Constitution, and pursuant to two resolutions adopted by the Conference in 1974 and 1980, with which you are familiar and whose application is incumbent on every member State of this Organization. That is why we believe that recourse to the supervisory machinery would mean that we are disregarding the Conference resolutions, leading to a kind of duplication and contradiction in the methods of work of ILO bodies – something which should not be done in the interest of a pressing cause, especially since the Director-General sends a fact-finding mission every year in application of the two above-mentioned resolutions. I ask whether there is any doubt as to the veracity of the information and data contained in the Director-General's Report, which is acknowledged by all to be objective, honest and serious.

2. The records of the Office's Committee on Freedom of Association are full of countless complaints against the Israeli occupation authorities alleging the violation of trade union rights and freedoms, including cases Nos. 567, 797, 811, 1,290 and 1,414, to mention but a few. What purpose have these complaints served? In spite of the clarity and transparency of the recommendations formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Israeli occupation authorities have failed to take any of these recommendations into account, as evidenced by the fact that these cases of violation of trade union rights and freedoms are still open. The Director-General's Report this year clearly attests to this. You can see for yourselves if you turn to paragraph 98; that way I shall not have to go into the details which are familiar to all of you.

3. Many statements have been made in accordance with article 24 of the Constitution, the latest being the opinion submitted in 1986 by the Legal Adviser to the 233rd Session of the Governing Body, which clearly stated that the occupation of Arab territories by Israel in 1967 could not be considered as having the effect of extending to the territories occupied by Israel the obligations arising from the Conventions it had ratified. Consequently, the Governing Body considered that the representation submitted in accordance with article 24 was not receivable. The Legal Adviser moreover was of the opinion that the cases submitted under article 26 of the Constitution would be irreceivable. I wonder if there are other articles we can invoke to have the ILO receive our complaints. Perhaps the American delegate can tell us.

4. Those who attended the 63rd Session of the Conference in 1977 know that the Conference rejected the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards on the grounds that the Committee had exceeded its prerogatives and mandate, by examining reports submitted by occupation authorities which did not have the right, under the provisions of international law, to extend the scope of these laws to citizens subject to military occupation.

5. Other supervisory bodies deal with ordinary situations in the context of the international labour code, in other words, cases involving sovereign States, or a sovereign State and its own citizens. As for military occupation, it is an extraordinary situation which consequently requires extraordinary measures. At present, the ILO Constitution has no article covering such cases, which lie beyond the usual relations between nations and peoples.

To sum up, your Conference, as a supreme authority, remains competent to monitor this extraordinary situation until the occupation ends and the Palestinian people is free to exercise its right of self-determination and sovereignty over its territory. This sitting is but one manifestation of the ILO's obligation to give due attention to the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories, until such time as the Conference establishes a standing committee to deal with this question."

Provisional Record

Eightieth Session, Geneva, 1993

Special Report of the Resolutions Committee on the Committee's Entitlement to Deal with the Resolution concerning the Situation in Rwanda

1. The Committee had before it 15 resolutions submitted in accordance with Article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Fourteen of the resolutions were considered receivable in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders without contestation and discussion. One, however, gave rise to questions as to its receivability.

2. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that the resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda[1] had been submitted in circumstances which needed to be clarified. Provisional Record 1 (Rev.) stated that "A resolution on the above subject was submitted by a person whose credentials had not been received at the time this issue of the Provisional Record had to go to print". Under Article 17, paragraph 1 (1), of the Standing Orders, a resolution had to be submitted by "a delegate to the Conference". Article 26 of the Standing Orders stipulated that the credentials of delegates should be deposited with the International Labour Office at least 15 days before the date fixed for the opening of the session of the Conference. Accordingly, the question arose as to whether the resolution had been submitted in conformity with the Standing Orders. He stressed that the point he was raising was not against the substance of the resolution itself but about procedures under the Standing Orders, which were drafted by people with experience of the ILO for the benefit of the proper functioning of the Committee. He remarked that a person who had doubts about whether his credentials had been submitted in time could seek the assistance of colleagues already accredited to the Conference. He sought the advice of the Legal Adviser as to whether the Committee was entitled to deal with the resolution or not.

3. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, emphasizing the seriousness of the substance of the resolution because of the gravity of the present situation in Rwanda, pointed out that the text of the resolution had been received on time, as indicated by Provisional Record 1 (Rev.), but that the Government of the author of the resolution had been late in sending in his credentials. The delegate had, however, been informed of his nomination by the Government and he had then submitted the resolution on time. In the view of the Workers' group, the resolution had therefore been submitted in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 1 (1), of the Standing Orders, within the prescribed time-limit and by a delegate to the Conference. As the Committee had before it both a resolution and a delegate, the resolution should rightly be receivable under Article 17, paragraph 4. It was a matter of grave concern if the failure of governments to present delegates' credentials on time could penalize prospective workers' and employers' delegates who had submitted a resolution within the required time-limit. This would make it possible for governments to impede or at least influence the submission of resolutions by workers' and employers' delegates.

4. A member of the Employers' group drew the attention of the Committee to the expansion of Article 17, paragraph 1 (1), by paragraph 1 (2) which stated that copies of all resolutions should be available not more than 48 hours after the expiry of the time-limit laid down in Article 17, paragraph 1 (1). The second part of Article 17, paragraph 1 (2), provided that the Director-General could withhold the circulation of a resolution pending consultation of the officers of the Governing Body. He also indicated that Article 17, paragraph 2, could be applied in cases of emergency. However, the present resolution had not been made available within the 48-hour time-limit specified in Article 17, paragraph 1 (2). Thus, receiving it in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 1 (2), would create a precedent. While the subject of the resolution was important, there were procedural difficulties in receiving it.

5. The Legal Adviser outlined the two issues at stake: To be receivable, should a resolution be received (within the 15-day time-limit) from a delegate who was already accredited? And, was a resolution receivable if it was not made available within 48 hours after the expiry of the time-limit laid down in Article 17, paragraph 1 (1)? On the first issue, he pointed out that a delegate submitting a resolution did not have to be accredited at that time. In fact, in 1963 a draft amendment of the Standing Orders, stating that the delegate should be accredited, had not been adopted by the Committee on Standing Orders because the employers and workers believed it could hamper them in having resolutions received when their credentials were late through no fault of their own. The intention of Article 17, paragraph 1 (1), was not that the delegate should be accredited when the resolution was submitted, but that the delegate should be accredited when it was presented to the Committee, as was indirectly confirmed by Article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders. On the second issue, he explained that the practice of the Office had not always conformed to the 48-hour rule, as shown by the precedent set in 1973 when the Office did not publish a resolution initially because the author's credentials had not been received, but published it later, as was done this year. This had not given rise to objections. In fact, the solution more in conformity with the Standing Orders would have been for the Office to publish the resolution and make it clear in a footnote that the author's credentials had not yet been received. It would then have been the responsibility of the Committee to decide on the question of receivability under Article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders on the basis of the credentials received at that time. It was not necessary to modify the Standing Orders, but rather to revise Office practice. Two options were open to the Committee: to follow the 1973 precedent or to set aside the resolution on the basis of Article 17, paragraph 1 (2), as in this case, the Office had not published the resolution within the 48-hour time-limit through no fault of its author.

6. A discussion followed on the importance of ensuring that prospective employers' and workers' delegates were not penalized by the failure of governments to present their credentials on time and on the danger of amending regulations by means of various precedents. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that the Office should have published the resolution, as the Legal Adviser had indicated, and that the practice of the Office should be changed to avoid similar cases in the future. He added that the notion of "availability" in Article 17, paragraph 1 (2), was open to interpretation. It was possible to conceive of a case in which the Office would make a copy of a resolution available to a delegate, if requested, even though it was not in printed form. The Government member of Canada pointed out that in the past the Office had shown some flexibility, even contacting the Permanent Mission to seek assurance that the credentials of a delegate would be delivered, and it should be encouraged to continue this practice.

7. As proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom, it was agreed that the questions of principle posed by the Employers' and Workers' groups should be set out in a Special Report by the Officers of the Committee to the Plenary Session of the Conference. The Committee agreed to deal with the resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda, but did not wish to create a precedent by doing so. It supported the provisions of the Standing Orders on the date of submission of the resolution and on the accreditation of the author, and took account of the problem caused in this case by the Office's action based on an earlier precedent. In dealing with the resolution on this occasion, no precedent should be set for the future. The Committee requested the Office to change its practice in future regarding the publication of draft resolutions received on time, as outlined by the Legal Adviser. The Committee considered that the above-mentioned observations were particularly important in view of the fact that the time available for the Resolutions Committee in the future would be shorter.

Sixteenth sitting

Presidents: Mr. Abdel Hak and Mr. Bustos Huerta

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (Cont.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We are going to continue our discussion of the Reports of the Director-General and of the Governing Body.

Original French: Mrs. AHOYO (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Benin) – It is with pleasure that I add my voice to the chorus of those paying well-merited tribute to the President on the occasion of his brilliant election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would first of all like to offer him, on behalf of the Republic of Benin and on behalf of the delegation which I have the honour of leading at this Conference, my sincere congratulations. I trust that under his wise guidance the work of this session will be crowned with success.

I would also like to take this opportunity to express my gratitude to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the excellent Report that he has submitted for our consideration and for the activities he has carried out during the past 12 months in pursuit of the goals assigned to him as Director-General of the International Labour Office. I should further like to congratulate him on his reelection for a new period of office, and my country – the Republic of Benin – would like to reassure him of its confidence and support.

I note with satisfaction and I appreciate the relevance of the theme for general debate proposed to us by the Director-General of the International Labour Office, namely social insurance and social protection.

In selecting this theme, the Director-General has reopened a debate, the complexity, diversity and importance of which stem from the nature and basic postulates of the theme itself.

In the first part of his Report, the Director-General's methodological approach is based on a general study of social security and social welfare systems, accompanied by a comprehensive critical analysis highlighting their strengths and weaknesses.

The main questions addressed in this context are the scope of social protection, the administration of social security schemes, the cost of compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases, financing problems and the different experiences of industrialized and developing countries.

Viewed as an ideal at the beginning of our century, the introduction of social security systems was greeted as a hopeful sign in Africa in general and in my country in particular, since it corresponded to basic social concerns.

It has to be acknowledged, moreover, that in historical terms social security systems have certainly improved people's living conditions by increasing the life expectancy of millions of workers in Africa and throughout the world.

At the present moment, however, my country is among those which consider that social security systems in Africa, particularly in the countries south of the Sahara, are in a state of crisis.

As you know, the main feature of this crisis of structures, methods and policies is a substantial and continuous decline in contributions due to staff cuts in the public and private sectors – hence to the insolvency of employers and to a chronic lack of the public resources needed to subsidize certain benefits provided by social welfare bodies.

As regards Benin in particular, the branch of pensions administered by the Benin Department of Social Security since 1 July 1970 went into deficit for the first time in 1987.

This alarming situation which is the culmination of disastrous administration and of a harsh political and economic climate has weakened the Department so much that it is unable to meet on a regular basis its commitments vis-à-vis its claimants, since it showed an accumulated deficit of one billion six hundred million francs CFA in 1990. This in fact means that the level of social coverage is scarcely above 63 per cent.

After several audits, very vigorous measures were taken, particularly the drastic reduction of structural and operating costs, the establishing of improved financial resources, the suspension of early retirement pensions, revisions of pensions, more stringent medical examinations, the revision of the basic management and administrative texts and the drafting up of a new Social Security Code.

The implementation of the majority of these measures has made it possible to see a clear improvement in the Department's situation.

Despite these reforms, however, it should be noted that the system of social security in Benin, at the risk of disappearing, will need further technical and financial assistance from the international organizations.

In truth, seen in its context, the problem of social insurance and social security is first and foremost a problem of development. That is to say, the problems linked to a crisis in the social security system noted in the developing countries do not arise in the same way in the industrialized countries. Over and beyond these concerns, African countries in particular are faced with other major difficulties which are inhibiting their economic development.

It is obvious that the African countries cannot set up social security and social insurance systems which are consistent, efficient and operational when we bear in mind the fact that they are struggling daily with problems such as a labour market whose main features are unemployment among thousands of trained graduates and persons made redundant from enterprises; an increasingly high level of unemployment in rural areas; a significant informal sector; and intolerable levels of debt.

These are the new elements involved in promoting systems of social insurance and social protection in developing countries.

I am sure you would all agree that in almost all our countries the majority of the populations are not covered by the social insurance and social security systems in force which are therefore discriminatory in nature.

In fact, it is necessary to rethink, and to reinvent via a global strategy social insurance and social protection policies in African countries.

I, for my part, believe that, in order to take up the challenge imposed upon us by social protection, solutions must be sought in two directions – at the national level, and at the international level.

At the national level, governments must strengthen the systems of social security currently in force, they must develop and promote programmes to improve public finances and economic restructuring with a view to creating new enterprises and thus new jobs. Tripartism must also be strengthened at the national and sectoral levels, an effort must be made to avoid interfering in forms of private social protection and new complementary forms of social protection and social insurance need to be examined.

My dearest hope is to see our Organization, which is a symbol of social conscience, continuing, as in the past, its activities to help development in our countries, through its influence, its expertise and its institutional means.

The ILO, at this time of political and economic change, must strengthen fledgling democracies so that they can manage their systems of social security at this time of transition from centralized to market economy systems.

It should also continue its standard-setting activities and establish permanent contacts with international financial institutions with a view to mitigating the adverse repercussions of structural adjustment programmes under way in our countries.

The ILO, to assist governments and the organizations of workers and employers as best it can through its regional structures, should allocate the necessary financial resources to this with a view to ensuring that multidisciplinary teams in those regions may be truly operational.

In conclusion, might I be allowed to remind you that since the last session of the International Labour Conference, the political situation in South Africa has remained a major concern for governments and peoples.

That is why, on behalf of my country, the Republic of Benin, I note with interest the changes which have taken place, and which are taking place, in that part of our continent. Nevertheless, all parties concerned should enter into a frank and sincere dialogue with a view to the definitive abolition of apartheid in South Africa.

These are the concerns of my Government which I have the honour of representing at this session of the Conference.

I would like therefore to take this opportunity of saying that I would like to see the ILO, as it moves forward, to herald the search for peace and social justice for a better future for humanity.

Mr. EJALU (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda) – On behalf of my country and my delegation, I wish once again to congratulate the Officers of the Conference on their unanimous election. We are happy that the deliberations of this Conference under their able leadership are progressing well so far and we are sure they will continue to do so up to the end.

I am happy to inform this Conference that Uganda has continued to make positive and determined efforts to transform its political and socio-economic situation. The Government of the National Resistance Movement (NRM) has implemented liberalized economic measures within the framework of a dynamic programme with the IMF and the World Bank. The economic programmes are recording a spate of local and external investments. Inflation, which stood at 63 per cent last year at this time, now has come down to below 10 per cent. The official exchange rate has steadied within a narrow trading range of 1,170 Uganda shillings to 1,220 Uganda shillings per dollar.

Through tripartite consultations, a broad understanding has developed between the social partners in Uganda that structural adjustment is a must and should be pursued to mutual benefit. We agree with the statement in the Office Wages policy report that "structural adjustment is not something that can be opposed ... the need is to identify the optimal strategy for attaining the most successful form of adjustment". In our experience, adjustment measures carefully balanced between recurrent budgetary support and capacity-building in the economy is likely to introduce sustainable positive changes for all concerned.

As a prerequisite to the success of economic measures, the Uganda Government has put in place a democratization process and transparent methods of governance. In this regard, the Constitutional Commission has presented its draft Constitution to the Government. The interim Constitution empowers the current Parliament and the Army Council to promulgate the new Constitution. But because the NRM wants the new Constitution to have maximum legitimacy and acceptability, a statute has been passed by Parliament ceding this important role to a constituent assembly to be elected in November this year. The elections will be by adult suffrage. This will be followed by a general election for the new order as per the new Constitution the same time next year.

In the area of trade union democracy, we have made some good progress. A statute has been passed by the Parliament giving civil servants, teachers and employees of the Central Bank the right to unionize. This right had been denied to this category of workers for years. The organized workers, through their umbrella organization, NOTU, have also been given a constitutional right to send three representatives to the Parliament and two representatives to the constituent assembly. At the same time, formal steps have been taken to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976

(No. 144), most of whose provisions have already been incorporated into our national laws.

We note the Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, with appreciation. The Director-General has analysed the status of social security in developed and developing countries comprehensively. In the case of Uganda, active membership in the social security scheme is still restricted to the formal sector, for a total 400,000 members out of a workforce of 7.3 million, and a population of 17 million. This, therefore, means that the majority of the labour force, or 6.9 million workers, are outside the existing statutory minimum social security. There are two main social security schemes: the contributory and the non-contributory.

The contributory scheme, the National Social Security Fund, established in 1967 by legislation, is a provident fund to which workers and employers pay contributions regularly. Total benefits are paid out to the individual members at the age of retirement, or to their survivors in the case of death. The scheme covers the private sector and non-pensionable public sector employees.

For the non-contributory schemes, a pensions scheme and death gratuity funded by the Government exist for traditional civil servants, the teaching service and the district services.

The policy of the Government now is to encourage occupational schemes to supplement the statutory national scheme. Therefore, in the area of technical cooperation, we would like the ILO to join with us and assist in efforts to extend the coverage of social security to the large section of our population which is not yet covered. In this regard, we appreciate the ILO assistance already extended to the National Social Security Fund.

I wish to register, with great appreciation, the visit by the Assistant Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Faisal Abdel Rahman, to Uganda last year. He was the highest ILO official to visit Uganda in 20 years. Besides, the ILO has offered financial assistance for an employment policy formulation workshop and an international labour standards seminar. I should also like to acknowledge the contribution of the African Regional Labour Administration Centre in the training of labour administrators.

The ILO has been supportive during our transformation period and we look forward to more collaborative ventures in the areas of employment creation.

Concerning the situation in South Africa, my delegation would like to join other peace-loving nations, and with renewed urgency urge those people who are perpetuating violence with the aim of disrupting peace negotiations towards the smooth transition to majority rule in South Africa, to stop it. The situation in South Africa today demands courage – courage of a different kind. The courageous in South Africa should be calling for an end to all forms of violence – black on black, white on black, or black on white. The rest of the world, we believe, ought to maintain a cautious and judicious arbitration on developments towards a universally acceptable form of governance in South Africa until we are finally there.

In conclusion, on behalf of the Government of Uganda, I wish to welcome the new member States to the ILO, and to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his reappointment.

Original Portuguese: Mr. VAN ZELLER (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – First I would like to congratulate the President on his election to his exalted post and wish him every success in his functions.

The Report presented at this session of the International Labour Conference by the Director-General considers an issue – Social security and social protection – which is of great importance and very timely. The objective of extending social protection to all the population of all countries is, in our view, one which should be given priority in the plans of governments and the economic and social agents.

In fact, as the Director-General says on page 6 of his Report, "the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all individuals and households ... enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and to accept change, and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability".

Similarly, the factor of social protection is of growing importance from the point of view of the desirable intensification of trade between different countries and the overcoming of obstacles to free competition.

In fact, it is with justified concern that the economic agents of the most industrialized nations, particularly those whose social protection systems are the most highly developed, note that a large number of countries with a relatively high economic growth rate are not giving their citizens an adequate level of social protection.

This fact, by allowing the economic agents of these countries, to reduce unjustifiably and significantly, from the social point of view their respective costs, introduces an unacceptable element into international competition by distorting the operation of the market and may constitute in the near future a serious stumbling block for international trade.

In this context, we consider that the ILO should play its fundamental role by putting pressure on member States in the light of this problem, and in particular, by ensuring that international legal instruments already adopted by the ILO such as, for instance, Convention No. 102, should be incorporated into national legal systems.

Furthermore, I must also express here my deep concern at the deep financial imbalance affecting social protection systems in many countries, even in the economically strongest countries, which is casting great uncertainty over the future of such systems.

If in part it can be said that such a recession is the consequence of the crises which the economies of these countries are going through and of demographic factors, for example, such as the ageing of the population in Europe, it is no less true that the vulnerability shown by these protection systems requires careful consideration of the principles and methods according to which they are structured, in particular as concerns the need to reform the objectives which national social security schemes should pursue.

In this respect, it should be stressed that social security should evolve towards making a clearer and more effective linkage between public and private schemes by promoting, in particular, not only a rationalization of the different contingencies which the State should cover, but by creating fiscal and, financial incentives to strengthen effective recourse to private insurance schemes.

In this way, significant benefits would be gained in terms of a reduction of public social security expenditure, and a reduction might even be envisaged in compulsory contributions in cases where, as Portugal, they are too high.

Two other aspects related to the problem of the financial deficit of the social security systems which I cannot fail to mention are, firstly, the extreme need for adopting strict rationalization measures aimed at reducing the weight of the bureaucracy and of administrative overheads in public social security budgets and secondly, the need for strengthening the supervisory machinery for the granting of pensions and benefits, particularly sickness benefit, in an attempt to prevent fraudulent claims, which are often made in Portugal.

In concluding, I must also refer to another aspect which is very important in the context of these issues. The solutions to be adopted in this field must be the result of consensus by all the economic and social partners concerned.

In fact, the urgent solutions to be adopted in this field must be based on an open and careful discussion between all the parties and should aim at providing realistic models which take due account of the economic and actuarial provisions which must always undertake any reformulation of social security.

It is only in this way that we will be able to face up to the difficult challenges before us in this field and which are bound to increase in the future.

Original Chinese: Mr. WANG (Workers' delegate, China) – First of all, I wish to extend my warm congratulations to the President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I also wish to express my heartfelt congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents. I am convinced that under their guidance this session will be a complete success.

Social security is an important issue with a direct bearing on the interests of the broad masses of workers. In the present world, where economic and political situations are undergoing major changes, the working masses and the trade unions are all the more concerned with it. It is therefore very necessary that this session should take social security as the theme of its deliberations.

We have read closely the Report on Social insurance and social protection submitted to this session by the Director-General of the International Labour Office. The Report is rich in content in that it has listed the social security systems in countries of different types and has conducted some analysis of the common problems. It can therefore serve as the basis of our deliberations.

As a socialist developing country, China has always attached importance to the social security of the working people. In the second year after the founding of the People's Republic of China, namely in 1950, it promulgated regulations on labour insurance, which have provided workers with security in respect of old-age, illness, injury and disability, issues that had long been of concern to them. There are problems inherent in this system however, such as narrow coverage and payment of all the expenses by the State. As the restructuring of our economy progresses the social security system too is being reformed. The principle of this reform is to coordinate the interests of state, community, and individual. Its objective is to create a systematic social security scheme suited to the present level of the productive forces of our country. The focus now is to improve or establish unemployment insurance and work injury insurance and to increase the socialization of old-age pension insurance and health insurance, so that a fund-pooling system for social security will be established to which the State, the community and the individual all make a rational contribution. The trade unions in China represent and defend the interests of the workers. They have contributed considerably to the reform of the social security system in the country, through active participation and promotion, mainly in the following respects.

First, the trade unions have actively participated in the formulation of regulations, statutes and laws concerning social security by proposing schemes for such reform and reporting in a timely manner to the authorities concerned the workers' opinions of and requirements for the reform. They also participate actively in supervising the enforcement of regulations, statutes and laws concerning social security and in the supervision of payment, expenditures and management of insurance institutions' funds.

Secondly, the trade unions in China maintain that the workers' existing benefits should be safeguarded during social security reform and that reform should bring more benefits to the workers. They hold that the labour system, wage distribution system and social security system must be reformed in a systematic manner in which the interests of the State, the enterprises and the individuals are all taken into account. As regards the practice of the workers making some contribution to their old-age pension or health insurance, their ability to sustain it should be considered. Wage increases should, generally speaking, precede payment of such contributions and a ceiling should be set for individual contributions so that the three sides can each have a rational share in providing the workers with social security. These proposals from the trade unions have played an important role in promoting the reform of the social security system in China, thus gaining support from the workers.

Thirdly, in order better to protect the personal interests of the workers, the Chinese trade unions have made great efforts to institute additional insurance for workers on the basis of mutual assistance, by means of mutual assistance associations for the aged and mutual assistance insurance for accidents. So far, the Chinese trade unions have established more than 40,000 additional mutual assistance insurance organizations for workers, with nearly 8 million participants who may, during times of difficulty, both enjoy the protection of the unified state social security system and receive help from the additional mutual assistance insurance set up by the trade unions. This practice has been well received by the workers.

Although different countries are at different levels of economic development and offer divergent levels of social security, all countries, and in particular, their workers and trade unions are concerned with the same major question of establishing setting up and improving social security systems. We believe that economic development is of the utmost importance here and is the only guaranteed source of funds for social security. We have noted that against the backdrop of a sluggish world economy the governments and employers of some countries have cut their spending on social welfare, doing harm to the social security system and affecting the personal interests of the workers. This warrants our concern and should not be allowed to continue.

We believe that the International Labour Organization should make positive efforts to promote the development of social security in all countries. It should first further develop its studies on this question and collect material on the social security systems of various countries for reference; secondly, it should provide research results, information and advice to the three parties of its member States, the developing countries in particular.

The Chinese trade unions hope to intensify their discussion with other countries in this regard through their deliberations on the topic during this present session. We are ready to learn from all successful experiences and to work to establish and improve a social security system in China that suits our national conditions.

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, has asked me to request those countries whose representatives have not yet replied to the invitation of the Committee – Chile, Guatemala, Jamaica, Morocco and Yemen – to present themselves to one of the next sittings of the Committee either today, tomorrow or the day after tomorrow.

Mr. WILSON (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of New Zealand, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference, and offer our best wishes for the duration of his term of office.

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions would like to congratulate and support the Director-General in identifying the issues of social protection and social insurance as the key matters for consideration at this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

If there is one fundamental value that inspires and directs the work of the ILO, it is that value which was captured so emphatically and yet so succinctly in the Philadelphia Declaration's assertion that labour is not a commodity.

And yet the treatment of labour as a commodity is precisely the single greatest threat that working people face today in so many countries. It is a threat that carries with it a direct challenge to social cohesion, equity and civilized standards and behaviour nationally and internationally.

If ever there was an arrogance amongst higher-income countries that promotion of standards was something which needed to be done amongst the poorer nations of the South, then that arrogance is well and truly misplaced. There is a continuing need for the ILO to be proactive in securing respect for and compliance with its values and standards in all countries, and especially in some of the OECD countries which may previously have regarded themselves as international citizens above suspicion or reproach.

I can say this with some confidence based on the experiences of workers in New Zealand during the past two years.

Since 1984, New Zealand's economy has been progressively opened up and deregulated. Until 1990, that process of economic liberalization was underpinned by social welfare and industrial protection that shielded New Zealand's workers, and New Zealand's population generally, from the worst excesses of unrestrained international competition.

In late 1990, the Government changed, and among the first actions of the new administration was a substantial reduction in the level of most social welfare payments. The reductions ranged from 10 to 25 per cent.

In addition to the reduction in the level of income support, there were very severe tests on eligibility for it. In summary, the unemployment benefit was withheld for six months if a worker refused a job offer, left a job voluntarily or was dismissed for misconduct.

This was followed early in 1991 by the Employment Contracts Act which, inter alia, dramatically increased the employers' bargaining power and their ability to dismiss workers who resisted reductions in wages and conditions of employment, or to unilaterally alter contracts of employment.

This and other measures in the Act have seriously undermined the workers' security, dignity, freedom to choose and position during collective bargaining.

The Government has said that under the Act workers would have the freedom to choose between an individual contract or a collective contract, yet a public survey commissioned by the Government last year revealed that only 34 per cent felt they had any choice. There is no legal obligation for an employer to bargain at all.

The Government has said that workers have freely chosen to move to enterprise bargaining, but it does not disclose that it is specifically unlawful to strike on the issue of whether a contract will bind more than an employer. Employers thus have a veto power and the result is that there has been a drop of more than 90 per cent in the number of industry or multi-employer collective contracts.

The Government has said that workers have the freedom to choose who will represent them in bargaining, yet the Government survey revealed that 64 per cent of employers do not always respect their employees' choice. The law is inadequate to prevent employer harassment and direct engagement with employees despite their choice to bargain collectively through their union. Unions are no longer recognized in the Act.

The Government has also said that workers are protected by a minimum statutory code, but the minimum wage has not been increased in the two-and-a-half years the Government has been in power. A most vulnerable group, young workers under 20, has no minimum wage at all.

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions has lodged a complaint with the ILO regarding the content and impact of the Employment Contracts Act and awaits the outcome with interest.

I do not wish my comments today to be taken as interference in the due process of consideration of that complaint. Rather, they are intended to apply the experiences of one country to the wider theme which the Director-General has developed in his Report, that of securing adequate social protection.

In this Report, the Director-General contends that "the OECD countries have comprehensive [institutionalized social security] systems which typically … operate effectively and efficiently". This is contrasted with such systems in developing countries which are said, in general, to have "serious shortcomings as regards their operation".

I know that there is a vast difference between the adequacy of the New Zealand social security system and those in most developing countries, and I do not want to overstate the magnitude of welfare cuts in New Zealand in recent years.

What I want to say is that there should not be a presumption that in all OECD countries social security is constantly being improved. The New Zealand experience suggests that reversals are a very real prospect, and that the operation of social security systems can be adjusted to have negative labour market impacts. The effectiveness and efficacy of those systems should not be taken for granted, and I would hope that the Director-General extends the vigilance of his Organization beyond the practices of the developing world when it comes to matters of the operation of social security systems.

The Director-General has correctly identified employment injury compensation as a vital element in providing worker security. He specifically refers to New Zealand's unique accident compensation schemes which, as established in 1974, were inspired by the same visions of collective responsibility and social justice which inspired the signatories to the Declaration of Philadelphia, one of whom later became a Prime Minister of our country.

It was an accident compensation scheme of which we were justifiably proud and which attracted the attention of social reformers around the world.

It also had a social contract basis because the common law right to bring a case for damages in civil courts against employers and others was abolished in exchange for the entitlements under the statutory scheme.

It is with a real sense of sadness that I have to report that, despite surveys showing 80 per cent public support for the scheme, and in spite of political opposition from every interest group except employers, the New Zealand Government has reduced a fundamentally sound scheme to one which, from a workers' compensation perspective, now barely meets acceptable international standards. And it has done so without restoring the right to sue in civil courts.

As a consequence, it has been necessary for the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions to lodge a complaint with the ILO regarding a breach by the New Zealand Government of Convention No. 17 (ratified by New Zealand as long ago as 1938) which requires that, in respect of work injury, medical treatment is to be provided at no cost to the worker.

Our experience during the past two years therefore requires us to conclude that despite membership in the ILO and endorsement of its aims and values, the New Zealand Government does not appear to attach any real weight to the need to comply with ILO standards.

I commend the mission of the Director-General and his determination to extend compliance with ILO standards in the developing world.

All I would say is do not forget us in the OECD countries. The job is not finished. What has been achieved is not secure. The New Zealand experience is ample testimony to those sad but undeniable conclusions.

(Mr. Bustos Huerta takes the Chair.)

Original German: Mr. HESOUN (Federal Minister for Labour and Social Affairs, Austria) – This year's session is concerned with social security and the development of social insurance systems. In prosperous countries, especially in Europe, the past 20 years have seen considerable progress in the organization of social security. This offensive by the Welfare State has created social networks which have given all citizens, irrespective of income and social status, a high level of security in all areas of life.

Recently, however, the economic downturn in practically all the industrialized countries has led to a trend to cut back on many social benefits. Many politicians view these restrictive measures as a way of reducing pressure on the economy, without considering that this sort of saving can jeopardize a country's entire social balance.

Such retrograde development is at the expense of the weaker members of society, and it also means that the need for flexibility in the economy to undertake innovative programmes and raise qualifications and thus also productivity is neglected.

The Austrian Federal Government believes that social deconstruction of this kind is not the appropriate way of countering the worsening economic situation, which has particularly dire consequences for the labour market. Therefore, in our social policy, we are persevering with the development of the welfare state principle, and I must say that the policy is bearing fruit. The economic development of our country has also shown that a pro-active social policy has an important part to play in maintaining a society's economic stability.

I would like to take this opportunity to describe our federal legislation on care and attendance benefits. It offers a comprehensive social model and could serve as an example for other countries wishing to re-orient their social policy.

Until recently, recipients of such benefits were granted a standard amount which was supplemented with personal benefits to cover individual requirements. This uniform system was overtaken by contemporary requirements. In the political restructuring of this area, particular attention had to be paid to changes in the social field, notably:

- The "generalization" of social security has been unable to take account of all individual requirements, especially those of people who need care;
- Provision for people needing care will increasingly become the responsibility of the private sector because hospitals and homes are overburdened;
- Because of changes in family structure and increased life expectancy, people in need of care are increasingly dependent on outside help;
- The social status of the disabled during the decade of the disabled has gradually been improved. However, in areas such as freedom of choice and in providing benefits in line with individual requirements, much remains to be done.

Our legislation on care and attendance benefits takes account of these factors and has enabled us to develop a model combining individual provision with enhanced benefits. Care and attendance allowances are subject to certain conditions, namely that the disability in question should require care for at least six months, that it should require more than 50 hours of nursing care each month, that the beneficiary should be at least 3 years of age, and normally the recipient should be resident in Austria.

The different benefits were divided into seven categories according to the level of need. Of crucial importance is the number of hours' nursing required, from 50 hours a month to round-the-clock care. Everybody receives an allowance sufficient, in terms of hours of nursing required, to provide for the care he or she needs; 350,000 people throughout Austria will for the first time benefit from the new provisions. They will now be in a position to exercise self-determination in dealing with their disabilities and arranging their daily lives according to their personal criteria.

This is an entirely new social system, and together with the sickness, pensions, and unemployment insurance systems, it will become a pillar of the Austrian Welfare State. Furthermore, the new system requires no additional bureaucracy. It can be run entirely within the existing infrastructures.

It thus achieves the highest degree of balance between requirements and benefits, while also embodying optimal flexibility in dealing with people's individual requirements.

In other fields of social security, too, we will have to learn again how we can produce this balance between social needs and a decentralization which takes account of the needs of society as a whole, the situation in industry, and social and private needs.

As we see it there can be no social policy without there also being a general strategy of implementation and the necessary centralized structures; on the other hand, a social policy programme will be ineffective if it fails to consider people's individual needs.

This is a social philosophy which will become increasingly important, both within Europe and beyond its borders.

Mr. NAGY (Employers' delegate, Hungary) – First of all, I would like to express the joy of the Hungarian employers' delegation regarding the President's election. I am certain that this Conference will be as successful as usual under his leadership and with the guidance of the distinguished Vice-Presidents.

Social security, a priority issue this year, is of special concern for Hungarian society and especially for employers. After 40 years of authoritarianism, Hungary is now striving to switch to a modern system with a free market economy. Setting up local social security authorities is part of this transition. Hungarian employers are in a special situation, as they have to cover 80 per cent of social security expenditure.

Social security is one of the largest parts of the country's income, with an annual budget of 600 billion forints, which is about $80 billion, a huge amount which is not easy to manage properly. It should suffice to finance sickness benefits and help to alleviate problems arising from occupational and other accidents. The payment of constantly adjusted pensions is also difficult in a country where the annual inflation rate still exceeds 20 per cent, although it is already slowing.

Added to all this is the heavy burden inherited from past regimes, which nationalized social security assets 40 years ago. The new democratic Government which came to power three years ago is reluctant to return this wealth. It is so reluctant that it has given back nothing of it so far.

What is more, social security still finances benefits which should be paid by the State. One of these is the family allowance for children, which obviously falls within the scope of the social welfare policy. It is thus hardly surprising that Hungary's social insurance institute operates with a very poor coverage ratio of 70 per cent, while the standard figure is around 30 per cent.

In Hungary today, 71 per cent of all actual wage payments go to the social security budget. In principle, this could mean that we have one of the world's best systems, but in reality just the opposite is true.

These facts clearly show that very few problems can be resolved with money alone. It is also evident that profound reorganization cannot be delayed any longer. If the owner of a company were in such circumstances, he or she would appoint a new manager with a new approach. This is exactly what we are going to do. Under the new management system for social security, health and pension insurance schemes will each be directed by a 60-member council. Employers and employees will send the same number of delegates to the health insurance council, while the pension council will include 24 employers' delegates and six representatives from pensioner organizations.

The employees' delegates were selected from among trade union officials during a nationwide referendum. Not only trade union members but all enfranchised citizens were able to go to the polls. Naturally, the voting also reflected current power relations between the various trade unions and trade union alliances. Under the electoral law, at least 25 per cent of eligible voters must turn out for elections to be valid.

As in other countries, people in Hungary show little interest in politics. Parliamentary by-elections have had to be repeated three, four or even five times because of low voter turnout, and there was a possibility that this would happen again this time. We did not like the idea at all. In our view, the quiet revolution in 1989-90 was only the beginning of the process that will put an end to the paternalistic state, in which other people decide what is good for the individual and state power appears as an obscure castle cloaked in Kafkaesque mist. Such a state of affairs is unfortunately extremely agreeable for a state which is unwilling to give up power. Constant reference to democracy and untiring work are needed to achieve our aim. The election of employee delegates is in principle not of concern to employers. "Leave agitation to the trade unions", we may say. But we know full well that the issue is much more complex than that. It is a question of limiting the role of the State so that social security ceases to be a servant to the central budget, but promotes its original aims, for which this huge sum is after all paid. In this case, we hope contributions can be reduced as well.

For this reason we too campaigned for voter participation. Polling stations were set up at places of work, and workers at several places were allowed to leave their jobs early for the elections. As a result, voter turnout was nearly 40 per cent, making the elections valid beyond any doubt. However, this did not result in a happy ending.

While this unexpectedly great success brought legitimate employee representation, the next step was to call into question the legitimacy of the employer side.

The highest forum in Hungary's world of labour is the tripartite Council of Reconciliation. It is empowered to negotiate minimum wages, the questions relating to the Labour Code and all basic issues in the field. It has sent its delegates and experts to ILO general assemblies from year to year, and it has been generally accepted that Hungarian employers are represented by the employer side of this council. This side comprises nine organizations, which you may find too many, but we leave it to the employers to decide which and how many organizations they need. Artisans, cooperatives, small and large entrepreneurs and farmers all represented. As one company often participates in more than one interest group, the real extent of representation is thus impossible to know. We have thus decided to offer a tenth of delegates to each and one tenth to the "employers" of the budgetary sphere, or the public sector. Strange as it may sound, the public sector still has a part to play in ventures too. This is a vestige of the old system. To our complete surprise, this gesture was completely misunderstood. The representatives of the public sector are demanding one-third of the employer mandates on the grounds that it too contributes to social security.

This argument is of course indisputable, as the public sector and its employees certainly pay a lot. But it is not the same thing to pay taxes from budget subsidies and to do it from one's sales returns. In a free market economy, prices can rise as high as the market permits, incorporating premium costs, wages and related charges, as well as return on capital. It follows that as the extent of payable contributions increases, whether taxes, fees, customs duty or other charges, wages and return on capital must necessarily decrease. The level of wages is the concern of the trade unions which, emerging stronger from the elections with our assistance, will not allow wages to fall on this account. This means that higher contributions would be accompanied by lower returns on capital and greater taxes. However, while taxes involve a far smaller rise affecting the economically active population as a whole, the impact of a decline in returns on capital is considerably greater. We believe that now, when Hungary badly needs more foreign investment, it is wrong to obstruct employers in speaking out on questions that basically affect them and limit their influence.

Social security is regulated and controlled by the State, whose delegate is always welcomed by the local authorities. On top of all that the State is also the biggest provider of health care due to its continuing monopoly of that sector. We are convinced that the present wrangling is against the interests of employers and employees, its sole aim being for the State to retain its influence, which obviously needs to be reduced in every area. The Hungarian Government is waging a desperate rearguard fight to maintain, or in some places strengthen, its position. It is rather strange for a Government which won free elections three years ago. I feel our ministers should think more of the next elections in 1994.

Meanwhile, we have to do all we can to defend the path which leads to a market economy and, in our belief, to a just and better world. I am asking the world's employers to help us in this struggle.

Original Arabic: Mr. A. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – I should first like to congratulate the President, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Syrian Arab delegation, on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, which is particularly important by virtue of the crucial topics on its agenda.

Let me add that his election is not only a tribute to his personal and moral qualities and to his scientific merits but it is also a great honour for Egypt and for the Arab and African groups.

On the occasion of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, I feel that it is my duty to reiterate the desire of the Syrian Arab Republic to continue its dedicated cooperation with the ILO and its different units, organs and committees in the interests of development and progress. As a member State of the ILO, we are committed to pursuit of the Organization's goals and compliance with the resolutions, Conventions and Recommendations adopted at its Conferences, especially regarding human rights and trade union rights, since we are a country that cherishes freedom and fights for what is right and good.

We have therefore always sought earnestly and sincerely to implement the ILO's Conventions and Recommendations, in the interests of all three constituent parties and primarily of the general public, in line with our policy, which is based on the words of our President Hafez al-Assad, who has said: "We exalt and celebrate labour and workers, we oppose exploitation and exploiters and we are broadening the scope and opportunities for work in order to thwart all exploiters and parasites".

We therefore attach great importance to international labour standards, which we are earnestly and sincerely seeking to apply. We continually review our legislation, taking care to respect the representative roles of the social partners.

In this connection, I should like to draw attention to the fact that we have ratified 46 labour Conventions dealing with human rights and with trade union freedoms in particular.

We continue to examine in detail a further 26 Conventions that we propose to ratify. We have referred them to the Prime Minister's Office in accordance with article 19 of the ILO's Constitution.

I do not wish to dwell on Syria's achievements in the field of integrated development but I feel I have to mention that our country, under the wise leadership of President Hafez al-Assad, has given particular attention to the role of the three social partners in promoting development and employment through both public and private development projects and through five-year plans and annual programmes in the field of economic and social development.

Our country takes great pains to achieve the social, economic and political goals that contribute to the well-being of the individual, whom we view as the necessary beneficiary of all progress. We further consider that social and economic development should go hand in hand with worldwide development, and my country therefore makes every effort to protect and enforce human rights, using all available means, be it national legislation or international regulations and instruments.

I have studied the Report prepared by the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, for this session of the Conference and I wish to thank him for the enormous effort he invested in preparing the main document and the appendices. We greatly appreciate the action taken by the ILO to enhance the Organization's efficiency and to find ways and means of meeting its constituents' needs in all areas, especially with respect to reforms in existing social insurance and social protection schemes in many member States.

We are particularly grateful to the ILO and its different units and organs for their activities and services in 1992 in a number of different fields and countries, underscoring the Organization's importance and the involvement of member States in its work.

I should also like to commend the many useful initiatives undertaken in a large number of countries in areas such as international labour standards, the working environment, working conditions, human rights and the work force and development.

Special mention should be made of the emphasis placed in the report on increased cooperation between the three social partners, the Arab Labour Organization and the Arab States. Joint programmes of activities have already been proposed in such areas as vocational training, employers' activities, child labour, working women, international labour standards and technical cooperation activities in the Syrian Arab Republic.

While welcoming all assistance from the ILO in this field, we hope that the programmes concerned will be extended to meet the needs of the three social partners in our country and that more funds will be made available for their implementation.

We wish to offer our warmest thanks to the Director-General for his objective approach to the preparation of Appendix II to his Report concerning the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, which is the 16th report on the subject to be submitted to the International Labour Conference. The Appendix reviews the extent to which the Director-General's recommendations on the matter in previous reports, especially that submitted at the 79th session of the Conference, have been implemented.

In conclusion, the Syrian Arab Republic wishes to thank the ILO, represented by its Director-General and the staff of its different units, for its work, which is greatly appreciated. I wish the Conference every success and I hope that a spirit of fruitful cooperation will prevail among the three social partners and all the member States so that our cherished Organization will be able to achieve its lofty aims.

Original Portuguese: Mr. IBRAHIM (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference.

Before beginning, once again we would like to reiterate before all delegations that the Portuguese language requires the status of an official language not only in this house but in all the other forums of the United Nations.

Our intervention on behalf of the Brazilian Workers' delegation before this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference aims at highlighting the themes and the proposals of ILO activities in our region. We are at a historic moment of great change throughout the world and the ILO has a strategically important role to play in the process of the structural adjustment which we are experiencing.

It is necessary and important to stress and reaffirm the tripartite principle, even though it is frequently attacked. It is a fundamental instrument for the consolidation of democracy. We reiterate that the practice of tripartism should also be extended to other bodies of the United Nations and specifically, to those which influence the labour world. We insist that cooperation and exchange programmes between countries should be in keeping with international labour standards and Conventions. We hope that these principles will be guaranteed in our region with the establishment of MERCOSUR and NAFTA.

The ILO, by virtue of its tripartite composition and the importance of the subjects with which it deals, has served and must continue to serve as a reference point in guiding relations between capital and labour. I should also like to stress its most important role as a custodian and safeguard for the social rights achieved until now.

As we draw towards the end of one century and the dawn of another, the world is witnessing comprehensive and deeply rooted changes in economic and social relations. We have here a strategic field of cooperation and dialogue, and a well-defined objective: the strengthening of democracy and social justice. Social justice has to be understood as the guarantee of employment, wages and conditions worthy of work, as well as decent health care, education, housing, basic sanitation, as well as in these times of changes training, skills acquisition and vocational retraining. In this respect the Workers' Education and Technical Cooperation Branch of the ILO plays an important role.

The cooperative system amongst workers is a valuable instrument in dealing with the challenges of high unemployment rates and a growing informal sector, in both the rural and urban sectors. For example, in our country, 75 per cent of the population live in urban areas, and 50 per cent of the active population either work in the informal sector or are unemployed. The ILO's cooperation programme thus deserves special mention.

In this panorama of change and structural adjustment, attempts are being made to detract social security from its proper objectives. Special attention must be paid to this question, so that the well-being of workers is not transformed simply into an object of gain. We must also ensure the practical application of tripartism in the social security management bodies and ILO participation is crucial in this respect.

The complaints which have come here from our country on the non-compliance of some sectors with the basic principles and rights of workers guaranteed by the Conventions we have ratified, are a subject of concern and have received appropriate treatment by the responsible bodies in collaboration with trade union bodies. The seriousness with which the problems regarding the elimination of child and forced labour are dealt with in my country is the fruit of constant activities of the trade union movement, with the support of the ILO

Despite all this, countless children are introduced on to the labour market, if they are not assassinated or left to wander miserably on the streets far from the schools. A new legion of illiterate and second rate citizens is thus being prepared. Opposed to this crude reality, Brazil's main trade unions, the Força Sindical, CUT and CGT, as well as other institutions, have drawn up a programme which has had a great impact on the upholding of international labour standards as regards the elimination of child labour.

Faced with the increasing deterioration of the social situation in the country, the Brazilian trade union movement is shouldering its responsibilities, not only in the field of economic and cooperative struggles, but in coming to the rescue of the workers and citizens. At this time of the formation of mega-blocs, the internationalization of the economy and the new international labour division, it is essential that trade unionism should be seen as a social partner, an actor and an agent of development.

To this end the international cooperation and financing bodies and agencies should also change their role and structure with the object of promoting development and maintaining man as the heart of their concerns.

We must also emphasize that it is essential for there to be a convergence of interests between the workers of the north and the workers of the south.

Now as democracy is being affirmed as a universal value, we reiterate our hope and willingness to fight for the building of a society with social justices and sustainable development, one which will once and for all eliminate hunger, poverty, slavery and fratricidal wars between peoples.

Original Spanish: Mr. SIFONTES (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, El Salvador) – It is a great pleasure to express to Mr Abdel-Hak, on behalf of the Government of El Salvador and of the delegation which I head, our most sincere congratulations on his election as President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Allow me also to extend a cordial welcome to the distinguished delegations which are taking part in our Conference, and to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as the Director-General of the ILO.

The Government of El Salvador has carefully studied the Report submitted by the Director-General and considers that the role played by the ILO has been fruitful, as reflected in the two parts of the Report. The first deals with the evolution of the social security and social protection systems of member States, and with the role which the ILO can play to contribute to making those systems more effective and efficient. The Report stresses that many countries, including my own, are planning to carry out radical reforms within their social security and social protection systems, with the aim of improving administration and functioning of social security institutions.

The second part of the Report discussed topics of great importance, such as international labour standards and human rights, and the ILO's efforts to promote a more rigorous compliance with international labour standards and a greater respect for human rights within the ILO's mandate.

Other programmes which are of great interest are those concerning: (a) employment and development, whose aim is to alleviate poverty, promote democratic policies and further the protection of workers; (b) vocational training, to promote a greater effectiveness and equality of training systems, by introducing improvements in the policies and design of labour relations programmes; (c) labour administration and labour relations, to encourage tripartism and to promote the development of labour relations systems, of labour legislation, and of guidelines on individual employment relations and on the establishment of wages in accordance with the principles of the ILO and national conditions and requirements; and (d) labour conditions and environment, to improve such conditions so as to improve the well-being of workers.

In keeping with these programmes and with a similar objective, in my country we have created a Forum for economic and social concertation, fruit of the peace agreements signed by the Government and the FMLN guerrillas. This Forum is characterized by the equal participation of workers, employers and government representatives. The Government has proposed, as a first stage, the revision of labour legislation to promote and maintain a climate of harmony in labour relations, without detriment to the unemployed and the public at large; it also proposed the review of the real situation of marginal urban and suburban communities with the aim of seeking specific solutions to problems springing from the armed conflict which has afflicted my country in the past years. Consequently, the Forum offers adequate machinery for the concertation of measures which will alleviate the social cost of structural adjustment programmes.

On 17 February this year, the Forum reached a first "agreement on principles and commitments" which the ILO had the opportunity to analyse in the context of a request for technical cooperation, and found this agreement to be of utmost importance in view of the dramatic situation which El Salvador experienced during the armed conflict, which finished exactly 16 months ago. The ILO qualified the preamble of the agreement as a real profession of democratic faith because it is based on the principles of universal recognition of the dignity of work, the supremacy of the Constitution, the harmony between workers and employers, productivity and distribution, and respect for the law and the right to organize.

Amongst the labour-related topics dealt with by the Forum is the study of the ILO Conventions regarding freedom of association, women and child labour, employment and minimum wages, with a view to recommending their rapid ratification. Also, in a relatively short time, we will establish a preliminary draft of the labour code to harmonize our labour legislation with the international labour standards we have ratified.

We intend, with the support and cooperation of the ILO, which, as is well known, has a very lengthy and valuable experience in the labour field, to restructure the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare to make it consistent with economic and social changes, and to be in a position to be able to respond to the requirements which will arise in the near future.

As our achievements in the labour field grow, it will become all the more essential for my country to have a body to ensure in practice the fulfilment of its aims, and at the same time to promote mutual respect between the social partners – the driving force of these achievements and changes.

The people of El Salvador look forward to the definite consolidation of peace, and therefore insist that all the promises made be kept. That is why we wish to avoid any frustration and will act in accordance with their just aspirations.

The process of change witnessed by my country will promote the appearance of a new society in El Salvador, where happiness and well being will belong to all. However, we must remember that there can be no peace without justice. Furthermore, we must remember that injustice disrupts the peace, and that peace without justice is not peace, just the appearance of peace. It is essential that our society experience an authentic state of law, because since man is a free being by nature, the State must provide him with conditions in which he can work in freedom and in a responsible manner. From this arises the right to legal security, which presupposes the elimination of anything which is arbitrary and violent, and the creation of a legal framework in which all individuals can exist in full knowledge of the consequences of their acts. This right to legal security has given birth to a state of law, in which all legal power and all right to govern must be based on the law.

To conclude, I should like to refer to one of the valuable teachings contained in the Report submitted by the Director-General, which states that the main object of the employment and development programme is to alleviate poverty. This reminds me of something Montesquieu said: "A man is not poor because he has nothing, but because he has no work".

Original Spanish: Mr. ROSALES (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) – We greet the President and the Vice-Presidents and congratulate them on their election. We also take this opportunity to greet the more than 150 countries present at this important Conference, the only tripartite body of the United Nation's family which, for 74 years now, has been defending the principles of human dignity, solidarity and social justice. The subject of the Director-General's Report is far reaching and of very great importance, namely, social insurance and social security. The Report refers to social security as a key aspect of solidarity and as a fundamental responsibility of the State.

We the workers of Ecuador have been fighting continuously and tenaciously for democracy. Nevertheless, democracy has been restricted to the mere election of representatives and a government which, under pressure from powerful economic groups, have simply yielded to economic and political greed. The present fad of flexibility – but only for one sector, namely workers – aims at eliminating freedom of association and trade union rights, and at restricting collective bargaining and other forms of social organization. The groups who hold economic power have demonstrated that they are manipulating state agencies for personal or groups aims. Moreover, they have created corruption in the various levels of government and we very much regret that some of them are now members of the present regime. As a result, our country is now suffering from complex problems: infant mortality rates of 1 per cent, illiteracy rates of 13 per cent, and unemployment rates of 17 per cent of the economically active population; the basic family basket is estimated at around $300, whereas the basic wage is only $30. There is one hospital bed per every 10,000 inhabitants, and only one out of every 1,000 Ecuadorians has access to university. Of every 1,000 Ecuadorians, only one eats three times a day. The workers and the people of our country are looking with great anxiety at the gradual and permanent impoverishment of society. A threat of dismissal hangs over the heads of many public sector workers, without there being any clear rules as to their future. Perhaps they will simply be added to the vast and growing numbers of informal sector workers who have no social protection whatsoever, and little hope of becoming productive. They are simply sellers and consumers.

In other Latin American countries we have seen how this type of plan and neo-liberal model puts an end to the productive sector, and diminishes national sovereignty. Such policies have led to a greater concentration of economic and political power, and a disregard of the State's social function. But within a short time there have been extreme social reactions as a result of a desperate fight to survive. This extreme neo-liberal plan has failed in the industrialized world and been discarded or altered. However, we accept it as a positive discovery. We do not wish to see such a situation in our country, but it is unfortunately coming. In this respect, a number of important events have taken place of late in our country. There was an indigenous uprising of considerable size which highlighted the marginalization of an important sector of our society, which is now calling for justice and space as human beings. Last September a large package of social and economic adjustments was introduced as the only way to improve the economy of the country; there was also talk of compensatory social package. However, neither the one nor the other have been realized. So, a few days ago organized labour woke up and called for a national strike to indicate to the Government that we do not agree with this policy, which is the result of the pressure exerted by international creditors. Naturally, the authorities responded with repression, in particular with the arrest of several labour leaders, who are treated not as labour leaders, but as common criminals.

In fact, our model of government contains no social criteria. At present, the national congress is considering the State Modernization Act. We agree that the State as a whole should be modernized so that it will stand at the service of society. We are opposed, however, to a modernization which would transfer the resources of Ecuador to foreign ownership.

Laws and decrees have been approved to encourage labour flexibility, with the promise that there would be more employment, less inflation and a lot more foreign investment. None of these promises have come to pass.

Social security implies accepting the challenges of growth, development, employment, medicine, food and human development. Therefore, we feel that this is a joint responsibility, and we must all do our share. We have to be actors in the creation of our future, and not simply sit back as spectators, expecting others to do the work for us. Democracy has to be an authentic reality where all of us assume responsibility to the decisions which will lead to better times for all. Solidarity has to be part of our lives.

We call upon the ILO to intervene at GATT in order to ensure that foreign trade benefits all parties. We are being forced to open up to trade and to foreign investment, but the European Economic Community is deciding to restrict its imports of bananas, a product on which our country, as one of the major banana producers in the world, depends to a large extent.

On behalf of the Ecuadorian workers, we would like to express our solidarity with the 13 leaders of Telecom in Colombia who have been imprisoned, and with others who are being persecuted, such as our brother, Heberto López, for the crime of defending a company which is the property of all Colombians.

Finally we would like to take advantage of this opportunity to appeal to governments, employers and political and social institutions to abandon favouritism and personal or a group privilege, and courageously to open a new debate for the single purpose of working together to define a new strategy for global development that makes it possible to overcome deficiencies and ensure growth. We are struggling continuously to defend our lives, and in this we reflect the needs and aspirations of the people.

Mr. MARSHALL (Employers' delegate, New Zealand) – The Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, is concerned with very relevant and important but complex questions. The Report refers to the differences between the provision of social assistance in developed and developing nations and sees a great need for countries in the latter category to move from social insurance where benefits cover mainly persons in the formal sector, to systems of social protection resembling those applied in the developed nations. A three-tier structure is proposed, although the Director-General acknowledges that the process of evolution is likely to be slow.

The Report also refers to the programmes of economic stabilization and structural adjustment undertaken by many countries during the 1980s to correct imbalances such as large external or domestic deficits or excessive rates of inflation. The question as to what extent is it possible to have a safety net or at least some modified form of income protection for the vulnerable groups which are most affected by the process of adjustment is raised.

This is an interesting question in the light of changes which have taken place in New Zealand over the past few years. As is relatively well known, New Zealand, like many nations, has undergone a process of structural adjustment of the kind to which the Report makes reference. The differences in New Zealand's case is that existing social protection programmes were already there to cushion the effects for individuals affected by change. Recently, however, the same social protection programmes have themselves been under examination. The intention, in line with what the Director-General has to say in his Report, is to achieve the delicate balance implied by the notion of shared responsibility. As the Report states, "attention should also be paid to the encouragement of individual thrift and initiative, the traditional strength of family or community support, as well as the development of institutionalized schemes based on national or group solidarity". In New Zealand, it is recognized that social protection should not discourage individual initiative.

Over recent years, it had become increasingly apparent that social protection has gone some way to blunt the sense of individual initiative and responsibility. To remedy this situation, New Zealand has been moving towards a decentralization of services and has introduced the concept of means testing, encouraging individuals to operate within their means in providing for themselves. Government activity now is more usually aimed at helping those who are dependent on the State to move out of that dependency to the greater extent possible.

This is not designed to lower standards of living but in fact to assist people to attain a higher living standard by showing them the way to self-sufficiency. The same process has taken place in the labour market.

The capacity to develop effective social assistance programmes depends of course – and to a rather greater degree than the Report seems to suggest – on the existence of a healthy economy. Last year, in her speech to the Conference, my Federation's President, Mrs. Rosanne Meo, pointed out that government intervention cannot create a climate favourable for sustainable economic growth and thus for employment growth. She told the Conference that New Zealand's Employment Contracts Act and the shift to enterprise collective bargaining which that Act has encouraged is creating a new enterprise culture whose individual responsibility and initiative are given primary importance. As a consequence, employers have been required to take responsibility for their enterprises and to communicate with their employees in a way never possible under New Zealand's old centralized industrial relations system.

The results have flowed over into improved enterprise performance and into genuine economic growth. The removal of government intervention by way of the shift in emphasis in the industrial relations sphere, together with earlier moves to free up the economy, has seen New Zealand, over the past decade, move from a position of comparative economic weakness to a position of increasing strength. This positive change is resulting in both dramatic improvements in productivity and efficiency and in the long-awaited outcome of sustainable employment growth.

With individual responsibility in the labour market now well- established, individuals are increasingly able to build on their own choices and to enter into arrangements which best suit their needs and the needs of their enterprise. While a legislative framework underpins the new freedoms – accident compensation legislation, occupational safety and health legislation, training legislation and a range of other protective statutes – employers and their employees are now in a position to develop their own operating patterns around that framework.

A recent government initiative in the wide distribution of a publication entitled "Employment: Your Contract, Your Rights, Your Obligations", was useful in its confirmation of, and bringing attention to, the comprehensive set of minimum statutory protections for workers.

So, at the enterprise level, the onus is on all involved to enter into contracts, both individual and collective, which allow for the establishment of their own social infrastructure and protections, building on those provided in legislation. It is no longer a question of taking what is imposed but of using the freedom provided to the best advantage of all.

Therefore, in New Zealand the picture is changing. The narrow view induced by centralism and a restrictive bargaining process has given way to wider horizons where anything that is possible can be achieved.

Of course, not everyone is happy. But the major difficulty is not so much with individuals who have adapted well to the needs of the new environment. There is, in fact, an acceptance that changes in the world economy, high government debt and the importance of competitive trading have made individual effort essential. Instead, the real difficulty lies with the vested interest groups, particularly those who have lost long-enjoyed statutory protections. Such groups have been reluctant in the extreme to let go of centrally legislated privileges and to focus instead on the health of the enterprise and on their own need to change. Change is never easy, and those who, for a long time, have had things their own way have found it more difficult than most.

In regard to the last point, it is of some interest that a recent survey found that employees on individual contracts tended to be more satisfied with pay and conditions, more committed to the performance of the organization and more likely to perceive that good performance would be recognized and rewarded than those covered by collective contracts.

Last year my organization noted that not only countries but the ILO itself needed, in view of the rapid political changes occurring, to reassess the centralist approach hitherto adopted.

Today, I should like to congratulate the ILO on beginning the process of structural adjustment. It is not a process which has yet gone very far, but it is definitely a step in the right direction.

I cannot emphasize too strongly how great is the need for the Organization to continue to re-examine its role in the new economic environment surrounding us. The ILO has played an invaluable part in the development and protection of basic societal standards, but nowadays too much time tends to be devoted to interventionism and developing labour standards inappropriate to individual Member's circumstances. As a consequence, many Conventions remain unratified sometimes for the purely technical reason that, in a document intended for general application, it is extremely difficult to allow for variations from the standard set. Such variations may be entirely legitimate and yet make ratification a complete impossibility.

Rather than concern itself with the sort of generalities to which I have just referred, the ILO would, I believe, perform a far greater and more useful service were it to direct itself to providing research and advisory services at the regional level. The initiative towards multidisciplinary technical cooperation teams must be viewed as a potential positive step in this regard.

International organizations, like governments, have a role to play in the establishment of policy frameworks, and in the provision of support services to their constituents towards individual development within those frameworks. There is, however, no question that in the long run real progress only comes from individual acceptance and ownership of their own developmental responsibility.

Original Spanish: Mr. COBOS (Workers' delegate, Panama) – It is for me a great honour to congratulate the President on his election to this high and very responsible post, and I wish him every success in leading the work of this session of the Conference.

May I first of all express my thanks to the Director-General for his Report. It provides us with a very complete view of the situation of social security in our countries.

In our country the Government is carrying out the "Economic modernization strategy", which is no different from those applied in the rest of our Latin American region.

For example, it advocates a privatization programme which so far has only served to create uncertainty among the various institutions involved.

The Government is promoting a voluntary retirement programme, which is considered by the workers as a kind of dismissal in disguise. This will soon be reflected in the unemployment figures.

The structural adjustment measures imposed on the Government, and in particular the programme for the payment of the external debt, have produced an alarming deterioration of social services, adversely affecting our people. In order to fulfil its commitments to international financial institutions the Government amended the Social Security Act to the detriment of social security beneficiaries by reducing pension levels, increasing contributions, raising the retirement age, limiting coverage for workers' children and eliminating early retirement in all cases and for both sexes.

This law has been rejected by the workers. At no time has the Government been able to submit a reliable report on the financial situation of the social security institution. We have requested that an audit be carried out by an independent firm to find out the real state of the finances of the Social Security Fund.

We Panamanian workers have asked that a consensus be sought when it is necessary to make such changes. This is one of many examples where the Government has unilaterally and arbitrarily imposed its own interests.

The quality of life is deteriorating and the economic crisis is still getting worse. The health of our children is threatened by diseases which we thought had been long eradicated, and malnutrition and poverty are becoming tragically visible.

Unemployment, as a fundamental cause of these ills, is growing by the thousands. We do not know how far the privatization programme will go. Unemployment will increase because of the lack of investment in productive sectors, the voluntary retirement programme will be carried out and the industrial sector of the Panamanian economy will be destroyed. All these are the harmful effects of the Government's economic proposal. Another aggravating factor is that there will be thousands of people left unemployed as United States bases in Panama are soon to close.

I should like briefly to address this unemployment situation, which will result from the withdrawal of military bases and will have an impact on the employment level in the country. The Government of Panama has not paid proper attention to this serious problem, which requires a plan to find a place for these workers in the national economy. It has left them to their fate, despite the goods and wealth which have come back to the country, as well as the canal installations which represent billions.

It is important that this Conference become familiar with the alarming situation the workers face owing to both national and international reasons. As regards the national situation, the workers affected by the law of 25 December 1990 are still dismissed despite the recommendations which the ILO made to the Government of Panama. Public sector employees are working without proper labour protection.

There is no law guaranteeing job security for public servants and state employees.

The education workers are demanding the fulfilment of already adopted agreements, which today the Government refuses to observe. There is no need to point out that Panamanian teachers receive very little pay.

The indigenous communities in Panama are requesting more attention in the social sphere to improve their quality of life. Let us avail ourselves of this opportunity to ask the ILO for programmes aimed at supporting the millions of indigenous workers, remembering that 1993 was declared by the United Nations as the International Year for the World's Indigenous People.

An objective analysis forces us to point out that we are still not satisfied and we consider that there is excessive government control of the functioning of our trade union organizations.

Relating to the international situation, we denounce the fact that the member countries of the European Community, through the ruling of 13 February 1993, are threatening our region with still more unemployment. The number of unemployed could reach the figure of 6 million.

It is important to bear in mind that Panama exports 93 per cent of its banana production to the European Common Market.

We feel that the ILO should not remain idle faced with the threat of an increase in unemployment in Latin America, where 85 per cent of our children are suffering from malnutrition.

The banana plantation workers of our country have visited our sister organizations in Europe. We wish to thank them for the support that they have provided and continue to provide.

It is true that the Ministry of Labour of Panama encourages the ratification of important Conventions such as the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

We workers support this initiative and demand faithful fulfilment of the ILO Conventions and Recommendations as an important factor to establish a climate conducive to the participation of productive forces in joint efforts to achieve economic growth with equity.

In the view of Panamanian workers, social security and the material and spiritual well-being of the people are essential foundations in all political systems. We demand that our nation be allowed to be free and sovereign, and we thus call for the withdrawal of the occupying forces. We cannot have democracy, human development, equity and progress in a nation occupied by foreign forces. The fulfilment of this requirement is vital for a small nation wishing to improve its State and achieve its national independence.

Finally, the workers of Panama condemn the repressive policy of the Government of Colombia, which has imprisoned distinguished leaders of the telecommunications trade union, who quite rightly obstructed the privatization of the Telecom undertaking. We ask that the ILO send an urgent mission to Colombia and to secure the release of these exemplary Colombian trade union leaders.

Likewise, we condemn the inhumane blockade of Cuba, which as the Cuban bishops reiterated in Santo Domingo is detrimental only to the population, which is suffering from its consequences.

Original German: Mr. THIEL (representative of the International Social Security Association) – It is a particular honour and distinction for me to be able to represent the International Social Security Association here in the Plenary of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. The International Social Security Association is a worldwide organization which has ten specialized committees and deals with all the different questions of social security. More than 300 members from nearly 130 countries throughout the world reflect the international significance given to ISSA as a result of many years of high quality technical work. ISSA has become a recognized area of competence in the field of social security.

As Chairman of the Permanent Committee on Assurance Against Employment Accidents and Occupational Diseases in ISSA, I know how hard the work done in this sector is and it is only by combined efforts that it has been able to reach this high level. We cannot fail to recognize the substantial contribution to this result of close cooperation and joint work with the International Labour Organization. Exactly two months have passed since jointly with the International Labour Office the 13th World Congress on Occupational Safety and Health, for the first time in the history of ISSA, met not in Europe or America, but in New Delhi in India. The success of that event, which had 1,800 participants from more than 80 countries in the world, was demonstrated by the high-calibre technical contributions and excellent contributions made to the discussion as well as in separate consultations. This demonstrates explicitly how necessary and fitting it was to organize this Congress for the first time in Asia. I might also take this opportunity, once again, of congratulating the State of India and the Indian organizers through the delegation present here for the way in which they organized the Congress so professionally on behalf of ISSA and the participants.

The main areas of the ISSA/ILO Congress were in agriculture, chemistry, industrial safety, training and research. In this connection particular account was taken of regional problems, especially those of our host region and of proposals for solutions relative to its social and economic environment. At the end of the event there was a film festival and the ILO showed a film on child labour.

At this stage might I thank the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and his colleagues very warmly for his Report Social insurance and social protection and congratulate him on it. Indeed, it makes clear the need for international cooperation in the context of technical security and shows that the experience gained in industrial countries can only under certain circumstances be transferred. In this area prudence is called for and ISSA duly takes this into account. It is absolutely necessary that experience and knowledge of technical hazards and the correct measures to prevent them be integrated properly into the local environment.

It is not possible to make a 100 per cent transfer of experience and knowledge. We also have to take into account the social and internal conditions of countries, the situations of the working people, the environment, etc. The industrialized countries, with their responsibility and their competence must take the measures necessary for an appropriate transfer of knowledge. The large number of cases used as a basis for Report IV on Prevention of major industrial accidents shows impressively that it is not a question of one firm or one State but a problem that concerns us all without exception. It is a global problem. This is a fact that on many occasions has already been made clear to humanity.

If I might draw a comparison, when we are discussing disasters we are dealing simply with the tip of an enormous iceberg. Of course, we are concerned with this new dimension of accidents. At the same time, however, we have to consider that every minute of every working day a worker loses his life and more than 500 others suffer injuries.

A Swedish expert once said that every society has the incidence of accidents that it is prepared to accept. I think I am able to say that there is nobody in the whole world who would recognize that death or injury are an acceptable result of work. In spite of this, accidents occur and cost the lives of many people. I must also say that in the overall problems of accidents, we have to consider the interaction of different areas. The principle that human behaviour in one area influences what happens in other, and that different areas interact must be considered in future in all our activities. An individual cannot be divided up into different segments such as work, travel and transport or free time, but must be considered as a complex whole. The foundation stone of our societies, our states, and our lives is the human being – the human being physically and mentally whole and healthy – and we must do all in our power to safeguard human life and thus our own lives.

The sine qua non of any focused and effective action is to define the problem areas. It is therefore a matter of urgent necessity to work out inter alia standard, comparable statistics. This will ensure precise adjustment of preventive measures to meet the problems concerned and a significant improvement in their effectiveness.

As regards the environmental problems which are becoming more and more acute, vast sums of money are being spent in the attempt to limit damage. There is no question that what has been done in the course of economic development, the products and the resulting waste, are bound to be a burden to many generations to come, both substantively and financially, and the results will probably never be entirely eradicated.

The facts have for years indicated that we need to have a consistent environmental policy. And yet only now is vigorous action being taken in some areas, while the measures undertaken in others remain inadequate.

The causal relationship between this and occupational safety is obvious. Environmental disasters have direct and indirect effects on human life. The most urgent task facing us in the coming years is therefore not merely to put a stop to these developments, but also to bring about a reversal in the trend.

For the remaining time available, I will concentrate on the main points, as the ISSA sees them, and as they emerged from the last ISSA General Assembly. Priority must be given to support for regional and problem-specific training activities by institutions and organizations, along the lines of a "train the trainer". We must also extend the prevention of occupational injuries to traffic and free time in our methodology. It's useless, both financially and from a personal point of view, to consider them in isolation. Also, people must become more safety-conscious. Everybody, whether worker or employer, child or pensioner, has to be able to make sure that he can look after his own safety and thus automatically contribute to the safety of his fellows and of society and the world as a whole. The economic consequences and advantages of active and successful accident prevention should be incorporated more in the objectives of enterprises. Safety is a top priority. It has to become a reality, and the basis for this procedure is the establishment of comparable statistics to enable us to establish objective strategies.

I think that for the participants of this Conference, the significance of the problems I have dealt with and the efforts needed to solve them is familiar. They also know we can only solve those problems together. On behalf of the representatives of ISSA, I can offer assistance and technical support to anyone who needs it. Let us go far away along the road of humanity together in order to guarantee a safe future.

I would like to conclude by paraphrasing Schopenhauer: Safety and health are not everything, but without safety and health, everything is as nothing.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – I would like to start by congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election at this session of the Conference. I wish them every success in their work. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO on his re-election and to thank all those who were involved in the preparation of this session and of the Reports which have been submitted to us because they deal with very delicate issues for all of us particularly at this time.

Indeed, major industrial accidents, part-time work and of technical cooperation are all relevant issues and mean a great amount of work for the International Labour Organization and responsibilities and financial commitments for the International Labour Office.

Our Confederation believes that part-time work, in the light of the present economic circumstances, the economic crisis and increasing unemployment in various countries, is a form of employment which could possibly help to solve the problems of a number of workers and employers. However, it poses a threat to the social environment in a large number of countries, most particularly in those countries suffering from both the economic crisis and a heavy burden of debt. These countries lack the ways and means needed to protect their workers and guarantee their future. We fear that the spread of part-time work will lead to fewer work opportunities, particularly for the increasingly large number of young people, especially in developing countries.

In the Report on Social insurance and social protection, the Director-General paints a very detailed picture of the measures taken in this area in many countries.

We note that the problem of the deterioration of social protection in developing countries cannot simply be wished away, as many countries are being crushed under the burden of their debts and because of the restrictions imposed by the international financial institutions. These countries are also facing up to the problems of a serious international crisis, the discrimination inherent in international trade, a demographic explosion and more and more people needing social protection, particularly in the informal sector.

How can we then find solutions to this situation at a time when we are imposing restrictions on society as a whole in the name of structural adjustment, at a time when the riches of these countries are being pillaged by foreign enterprises and when unemployment is increasing, the informal sector, and part-time and temporary work are on the increase, and trade union freedoms and democracy either do not exist or are limited? The lack of freedom inevitably leads to an increase in unemployment.

We believe that in order to rectify this situation it is necessary for all parties to be involved, to find a clear strategy to identify the objectives and the ways and means of overcoming obstacles and achieving these. To do this, States, international organizations, and employers' and workers' organizations must play their part.

The International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions is a national and regional organization which has many matters of grave concern to resolve. Despite the modest means at its disposal, it is trying, to the best of its ability, to help workers in Arabic countries to develop trade union activities and to defend the rights and freedoms of trade unions. Here I would like to draw your attention to our cooperation with the International Labour Office. I would like to take this opportunity of expressing a special word of thanks to the Regional Office for Arab States, even though the cooperation programmes do not as yet meet all our hopes and aspirations. Our Conference brings together tens of thousands of workers and for many years has tried to defend workers' interests and devote much time and effort to trying to ensure that they enjoy a healthy working environment and to strengthen Arab trade union solidarity.

Among the problems which concern us are those of injustice, the denial of rights, arbitrary measures and the hostile environment in which hundreds and thousands of migrant workers in European countries are forced to work. This situation has been further complicated since the establishment of the Single European Act. We are also concerned by the despicable exploitation of migrant workers who have entered illegally into Europe. We repeat that their problems cannot be solved by arbitrary nor racist measures. The solution lies in respect for human rights and in trying to deal with the root cause of this massive emigration, and also in participating in the development of the countries which export this manpower, because if this issue is not solved the situation will become even more complicated and the adverse effects will undermine international solidarity and sour relations between people.

The question of emigration to Europe is of concern to us, but we are also faced with the same problem in our region of the world. Our Confederation is opposed to all practices which are contrary to human rights, international instruments and the principles of the ILO.

The principles, the Constitution of the ILO and its objectives aim to bring about social justice, protect the rights of workers, and strengthen the relations between the social partners. All member States of the ILO should respect these ideals, believe in these principles and help to achieve these noble objectives. What is alarming is that these objectives and goals are still far from being reached, and there are a large number of States which do not as yet truly believe in the rights of workers, the value of their participation or the validity of their claims, as can be seen by the fact that Arab trade unionists are summarily arrested, expelled, banished or tried. Our Confederation firmly believes in these rights and has tried, together with a number of Arab national organizations, such as associations of lawyers, parliamentarians and Arab journalists, to set up a human rights centre and trade union freedom centre. We have also drawn up a draft charter on human rights and trade union freedoms, and determined our economic and social demands. Our Confederation has organized a number of meetings and seminars in order to research and study the various aspects of democracy, freedom and the right to participate in economic and social life. For this reason, our Confederation has made tremendous efforts to help Arab countries where trade union freedoms are restricted.

At this session we have engaged in constructive dialogue which inspires the hope that trade union rights and freedoms will be respected. We have good reason to hope that at our next session we shall be able to inform you of the steps we have taken in this direction.

Among the objectives of this Organization is the defence of human rights and workers' rights to create an environment which can help to provide social improvement. It is therefore the duty of this Organization to help workers who are oppressed and affected by injustice, and where double standards are applied to appease particular interests.

The embargo, which has been imposed in Iraq for some two years now, has had very serious adverse effects on working conditions in that country, and on the present and future of the workers there. Purchasing power in that country is constantly falling, the working environment is deteriorating and children are dying in their hundreds. We therefore appeal to the international community in whose name the resolutions concerning the embargo were adopted, to lift this embargo imposed on the workers and people of Iraq, particularly since it no longer has any real reason to continue.

I would also like to say a few words about the embargo imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. This embargo is also leading to a deterioration in the economic and social situation of Libyans and foreign workers in that country. In this respect, I must emphasize that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya presented numerous proposals which would have contributed to solving the current crisis. We therefore demand that the embargo imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and the injustice perpetrated against its workers and its people be lifted.

We strongly condemn the massacres and "ethnic cleansing" perpetrated against the people and workers of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and we appeal to the United Nations and the international community to take immediate steps to put an end to that genocide. Let us avoid transforming Bosnia into another Palestine.

In Somalia, the workers have been the victims of a genuine disaster as a consequence of the civil war. Many had harboured the hope that the forces of the United Nations could restore peace in that country. But what do we now see? Further destruction, with more people wounded and more deaths.

We reject the policy of hegemony which is hidden behind the concept of humanitarian intervention. Our objectives must be peace, life and human dignity, and not the peace of cemeteries, oppression and extermination.

Original German: Mr. VERZETNITSCH (Workers' delegate, Austria) – In his Report this year the Director-General has described the main characteristics of social security systems, and referred to the different problem situations and indicated some initial solutions.

We very much welcome the fact that the Director-General has drawn attention to a subject which is so important for the whole of humanity.

The establishment and development of social security is without doubt one of the main tasks for the coming decades and it is particularly worrisome to see that the Report refers to the increasing trend to cut down such systems. This offers us food for thought. If what counts is quality, then exactly the opposite is occurring in social security systems. Social security development today is often directed against the trade unions and the International Labour Organization should exhaust every possibility in countering such a development.

I come from Austria which is a country whose social security system, for the most part, was established over a hundred years ago. In the meantime, the system has been developed to a high level. Practically everyone in my country today is protected by social security, whether they be farmers, wage-earners, peasants, etc. Social security consumes a considerable share of our GDP: in fact, 27 per cent of the GDP goes to social expenditure.

This development process, however, is not always planned as a whole. Each social improvement has had to be fought through with great resistance.

From the comprehensive Report by the Director-General there is one area that I would like to take up which is important for my country, that is long-term financing of pensions. In my country, contributions and other levies on the workers provide the basis for the pension system.

This system has in the past shown itself to be more just socially and more reliable than other systems, such as, for instance, the capitalization system.

Even if in the next few decades the number of older people increases, this contract between the generations can guarantee a solid right to a pension.

Of course, it is necessary to take into account certain social changes. Very recently in Austria a pension reform was adopted, the nucleus of which is a new adjustment of pensions, and which provides for a parallel development of net income between active workers and pensioners, which guarantees the longer-term financing of pensions.

In my view, however, the basic premise for the financing of pensions, or in fact social security benefits in general, remains employment and labour market policy which reduces unemployment and increases employment.

And that brings me to another subject which has been a part of social policy in my country for a number of years. Unemployment has increased considerably in the past few years, particularly amongst older workers. If you are 50 you are too old for the labour market on the one hand but you are also not old enough to obtain a pension. This situation cannot continue. We have to guarantee employment for all age groups.

Then there is the pressure from immigration in my country which, coupled with the limited possibility of the Austrian labour market to absorb such workers, has led to a high degree of illegal employment and the development of an informal sector in Austria.

At present we are making considerable efforts with a comprehensive package of measures which are above all directed at unemployment and illegal employment.

Here we should not simply say that the guilty parties are those who are employed illegally. Those who are guilty are the people who provide the illegal employment. They are making use of the social system, they do not pay taxes, and very often they practise unfair competition.

I would also like to draw attention to the fact that in Austria we are working to reform our labour market administration system with a view to providing better services to jobseekers and to ensuring that employers and workers together with the Government provide a better guarantee of employment for the further development of the labour market.

I would like to mention a field of social security which has recently been a subject of attention in my country, and which has already been referred to by the Minister for Labour and Social Affairs of Austria. This is coverage of the care and attendance contingency, in other words the fourth pillar of social security, as it is called. This is something that is absolutely vital in a developed society. In Austria up to 500,000 people need care, and I am pleased that this last big gap in the social security system in Austria has now been closed thanks to this measure.

Consensus and solidarity among all relevant social groups was the basic prerequisite for this important step forward in the development of our social security scheme. If progress is to be made in the international community, the demand for social protection must be met in the political, economic and institutional spheres.

With reference to the World Conference on Human Rights being opened in Vienna, the question of social security is, to my mind, no less important than other human rights issues. However, there are obstacles impeding the development of social security schemes, especially in the developing countries.

In this connection, I wish to draw attention to a development that gives cause for concern: instead of the informal sector in the developing countries being rendered more formal through legislation on employment, occupational health and in other areas, the formal sector in the industrialized countries is actually being made more informal. We cannot allow this trend to spread further. Given the importance of full employment for the funding and development of social security schemes, a special effort must be made to fight unemployment throughout the world. There are 36 million unemployed in the OECD countries and vast numbers of people throughout the world on the breadline, a situation that calls for drastic action by national and international organizations.

In this connection, I should like to mention the United Nations World Summit on Social Development to be held in March 1995 in Copenhagen. I propose that the International Labour Organization takes steps to launch a worldwide campaign against increasing unemployment at that summit.

The establishment and development of social security schemes, adapted to the prevailing economic and social conditions in each country, is a major task and challenge to be taken up not only by governments and social partners but also by the international community as a whole and in particular the International Labour Office. Let us rise to the challenge.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Seventeenth sitting

Monday, 14 June 1993, 3.00 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Tabani and Mr. Badey

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Before giving the floor to the first speaker, I should like to inform you that the Worker Vice-President of the Conference, Mr. Bustos-Huerta, of Chile, has been recalled to his country urgently. The Workers' group met this morning and appointed Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States, to replace him as Worker Vice-President of the Conference as from tomorrow, Tuesday, 15 June.

Original French: Mr. KALANTZAKOS (Minister of Labour, Greece) – First of all I would like to associate myself with the numerous speakers who have preceded me in presenting my warm and sincere congratulations to the President of this session of the International Labour Conference on his election. I personally, as well as the entire Greek delegation, am convinced that under his able direction our work will progress in a businesslike fashion and will bear fruitful results.

I would also like to express my deep satisfaction to the Director-General for having chosen, as a theme for his Report, a topic which if I may say so, is both old and modern and which is at the present time of major importance to all countries aspiring to economic and social progress. It is indeed the very objective which provided the basis for the International Labour Organization.

In our interdependent world, our changing world, today more than ever before all issues concerning social insurance and social protection in general generate lively debates, both among experts and among the social partners. This is because of the interaction which exists between economic change and social protection.

Relations of interdependence between social and economic goals are part and parcel of the decision-making process of our policy-makers and it is extremely difficult to strike a reasonable balance between these two goals.

If social protection has long been a basic component of economic and social life in market economy countries, this unfortunately is not the case in the fledgling democracies of Eastern Europe, which are now endeavouring to transform their economic and social structures in order to make the difficult transition to a competitive economy and a socially acceptable society. Indeed this is a very complex task and it does demand social consensus prior to the introduction of reforms in a period characterized by very heavy budgetary constraints when actual earnings are in decline, and inflation and unemployment are increasing.

In such a climate of tension, an increase in funds allocated to social insurance is likely to impede the process of the economic development needed by these countries. But, at the same time, the State needs to ensure a minimum level to meet the needs of the underprivileged.

Without vigorous economic development, the perspective for an improvement in social protection is poor.

What can be done, then, to stimulate this economic development; which alone can viably assist in setting up proper insurance and social protection bodies similar to those of the industrialized countries of the West.

Personally, I believe that the solution lies in restructuring enterprises, because the enterprise is the oxygen of the economy. Without highly productive enterprises, able to follow their strategies freely, an employment-creating economy cannot survive. Enterprises therefore must rid themselves of a number of characteristics which prevented them from playing their proper role in the past: that is to ensure an optimum allocation of resources, including human resources.

At the same time the State must be put in perspective by privatization which leaves the activities of enterprises to private initiative.

It would seem extremely important to emphasize here that, in addition to its economic function, privatization also has a social role to play.

Thus, part of the funds which those countries in transition are now drawing from the privatization process will be reallocated to those who are affected by present reforms, as a form of compensation for the transition costs. It is therefore urgent to put in place an adequate safety net, which will guarantee a minimum salary unemployment benefit. It is essential that these measures be linked to active policies in respect to the labour market, which will enable the rapid reinsertion of the unemployed.

The policy-makers of the East European countries must constantly be aware of the possibility that any failure to introduce an effective and just social protection system would run the risk of jeopardizing the entire economic reform. To reconcile social protection and market economies is indeed is a noble challenge, which should be taken up by all the forces of these countries in the years to come, in a climate of constructive dialogue which will ensure the broadest possible consensus.

If the East European countries are endeavouring to restructure their insurance and social protection systems on a new basis then the industrialized countries of the West should also proceed to make the necessary adjustments.

I would invite you to reflect upon the following very crucial question: what will tomorrow's security and social protection be like in an economic context marked by the increasing acceleration of technological progress and by the intensification of international competition? It is very obvious that systems will have to develop over time. They will have to reflect the structural changes which have occurred in society and in the economy, the demographic change in the population and in the labour force, changes in the labour structure, and, finally, the development towards new forms of organization of working-time.

At the same time the relative roles of the State, employers and workers are likely to change so that the responsibility and autonomy of the actors involved in the social protection system are reinforced and the effective recognition of the right to social security as a human right is taken into account.

In our developed societies, some people are unfortunately deprived of a guaranteed minimum wage. The disadvantaged population groups include not only the long-term unemployed, but also the elderly, single women, the handicapped and large families. Let us therefore show solidarity with them to provide them with a living standard and a level of protection worthy of our wealthy societies.

As the Minister of Labour, I would like to highlight the need for systems of protection against unemployment which are both effective and fair and which extend benefits to the most underprivileged as generously as possible. They should try to break the vicious cycle of dependence and bring an end to exclusion and segregation.

I would like to conclude my statement by referring to my country. In Greece, the right of the citizen to social insurance has been formally acknowledged and is enshrined in the Constitution. This demonstrates the great interest our State has for the recognition of this right.

The social insurance system is a public compulsory scheme, and it covers approximately 98 per cent of our country's population. The main financing sources are employers' and employees' contributions and there are also state subsidies.

Greece is very keen to ensure the proper functioning of the social insurance system so that it can operate, withstand the test of time and satisfactorily cover the needs of future generations.

This major concern was taken into account when a new law was drafted concerning the restructuring of social insurance. This law was recently adopted and its main points are as follows: for the first time tripartite participation has been made institutional; all insured persons are subject to the same conditions for retirement, contribution levels and benefits.

As regards benefits, the new law establishes equality of treatment between the sexes and undertakes to provide substantial assistance to mothers with small children or with three or more children.

I would like to emphasize with great satisfaction that the restructuring of the social insurance system was the subject of a very broad discussion among the parties concerned.

If we want to stimulate employment while taking care of the underprivileged we have to rely on the solidarity of those involved in our economic and social life.

Are not social insurance and social protection the best means of strengthening such solidarity?

The PRESIDENT – May I remind all the distinguished delegates kindly to adhere to the time-limit.

Mr. MAIBAWA (Minister for Labour and Employment, Papua New Guinea) – It is an honour indeed for me, my delegation, and the Government and people of Papua New Guinea to be accorded this opportunity to address this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Permit me, first of all, to congratulate the President on his well-earned election to the highest office of this Conference.

I also extend warm greetings and best wishes to the new member States, which have joined or rejoined our international labour community since 1992, as well as to the delegates from throughout the world attending this Conference.

The basic ideals of the 1944 Declaration of Philadelphia (which declared firstly that labour is not a commodity, secondly that freedom of expression and association is essential to sustained progress everywhere, and thirdly that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere) must continue to be the basic reasons for the continued existence of this unique organization.

Labour is now being increasingly treated as a commodity to be traded, or as a mere factor in economic development without due regard for the individual, family, community and spiritual well-being of the worker. The ILO must continue to safeguard its basic ideals in favour of workers or it will soon find it has no more basic and relevant reasons for its continued existence.

The Director-General of ILO and the Secretariat are to be congratulated on the excellent Report, which is timely, thought-provoking and highly relevant at these times of continuing economic difficulties, resulting in readjustment and restructuring, through all of which the worker everywhere has been very much on the receiving end.

The choice of social insurance and social protection as the major subjects for deliberations at this Conference is indeed most appropriate. The Report covering the two issues provides an excellent basis for meaningful and fruitful deliberations at this Conference.

According to IMF estimates, world economic performance increased moderately in 1992, compared to 1991, with world output for 1992 up 0.9 per cent, compared to 0.1 per cent for 1991. Real GDP for industrialized countries increased by 1.5 per cent in 1992, compared to 0.6 per cent in 1991. Developing nations showed an increase in GDP of 6.1 per cent in 1992, compared to 3.2 per cent in 1991.

My country recorded a strong rebound in GDP of some 9.5 per cent in 1991 and this activity was maintained in 1992. More than 90 per cent, however, of our better economic performance was due to our concerted efforts to push ahead with the development of our mineral resources, such as gold and copper, and, as of 1992, to the export of our first crude oil.

My country does, however, have its share of problems related to the downturn in the world economy over the past few years and the country has had to readjust and restructure to cushion itself against the shock of falling world prices for its agricultural exports such as copra, cocoa, coffee, tea, palm oil and rubber.

The world economic downturn has created a lot of sufferings for our people as a result of falling incomes from our agricultural exports and corresponding rationalizations, including in many cases closures of related business activities. Our unemployment is very high as a result.

My country, like most other developing countries, does have several social security schemes in operation but they do not cover the full range of contingencies: that is, they exclude appreciable proportions of the population as well as having serious operational shortcomings.

My country has two major social security schemes in operation: the first is a superannuation scheme covering the public sector and the second is a provident fund covering the private sector. The schemes are contributory and their coverage is restricted to full-time workers in each sector. I could not agree more with the Director-General when he urges ILO constituents to try as much as possible to recreate and extend the coverage of such schemes in order to provide for the whole population, although this could prove very expensive and may take many years to materialize.

The Public Employees Association also has a superannuation fund for its members, thus enabling a public servant to belong to two superannuation funds if he or she chooses to do so.

Regarding the provident fund, two or three larger trade unions have opted out in order to have their own privately run superannuation schemes on account of very much the same problems as those highlighted by the Director-General in his Report as being characteristic of such schemes in developing countries.

I urge the ILO to assist as much as possible in the vital area of attempting to extend the coverage and generally improve our existing social security schemes. Of course the ILO cannot export the social security schemes found in developed countries to developing countries but it could help to modify such schemes to suit the latter. Alternatively, it could develop and market its own social security schemes for developing countries, modifying such schemes further, if necessary, to suit each country's needs and aspirations. It is up to the developing countries to buy or not to buy such schemes.

My country has this year completed 18 years since political independence, and the social security and protection of our people is a long-term objective of our democratically elected system of government. The world economic downturn has brought upon us problems that require our immediate attention in order to preserve as well as to expand and consolidate our relatively young economy. We believe that the establishment of a strong economy now will guarantee long-term social security and protection for our people.

But I also agree with the Director-General that our economic growth, the general improvement in the standard of living, and good government and administration, have all been strongly assisted and promoted by the development and existence of our current social security and protection schemes through the mutual trust, support and solidarity such schemes have created between the three social partners – the Government, employers and employees – in our overall national development.

I also agree with the Director-General that access to social protection is a basic human right, as well as a measure of welfare, and its promotion depends on the cooperative attitudes of the social partners in each country, as well as how much the ILO can do to help through its technical cooperation programmes.

The promotion and extension of social security and protection schemes in developing countries like ours must become part and parcel of the broader issue of economic, political and social development. Much of the advice relating to such a broader issue comes from other agencies like IMF and the World Bank, and I urge the ILO to exert strong influence on these agencies in favour of workers.

As far as unemployment benefits are concerned, my country does not have any such schemes, and this is an area where the ILO's technical cooperation can become very useful. I will soon propose that both the ILO and my Ministry explore the possibility further, giving us options on what to do.

On employment injury compensation, my country does have a workers' compensation scheme through which benefits in the case of disability or death resulting from an industrial accident or occupational disease are paid. A proposal to convert the scheme into a fully fledged workers' insurance scheme is also now being investigated. Again, the ILO with its vast technical cooperation capabilities could help us in this investigation to formulate an appropriate policy and implementation mechanism.

Health care in my country is a national health service covering the whole population and it is provided almost free of charge. Social insurance health-care systems also exist alongside our public health-care services, and they offer a much higher standard of service but such services are always only available to those who can pay.

On family benefits, these are provided largely through our tax system where the tax rebates are flat-rated at a higher level for dependent spouses and a lower rate for all dependent children up to 18 years of age.

The indexation or protection of the real value of salaries and other employment benefits have been practised in my country up to 1992 when an independent tripartite minimum wages board was forced by our current economic conditions to abolish indexation for minimum wage earners, replacing it with productivity-based wage adjustments and reducing the minimum wage to further induce employment creation for growing numbers of unemployed.

For non-minimum wages, negotiations are continuing among public- and private-sector unions and their employers on whether or not the board's indexation provision should also be observed.

Our social security benefits are not normally indexed for cost-of-living increases, and this is an area that now deserves our attention with this Conference's enlightened assistance.

The present Government of my country is strongly of the view that the best social security and social protection for our people is to give each and every one of them a secure job from which to earn a decent and honest living. I know this is the full employment dream of all 164 countries attending this session of the Conference.

The Government of my country is doing its best achieve this goal by making it more attractive for foreign investors to invest in our country. In the first year of my Government's term in office, tax cuts and other tax concessions are being offered on all fronts to attract foreign capital and appropriate manpower to help us create jobs for our people. Concessions in other areas are also being introduced towards the same goal.

My Government is also strongly of the view that the ILO can play a most important role in our overall efforts to create jobs for our people. My delegation will be exploring these possible areas of cooperation with the ILO, both here and after we return home.

Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – The choice of social security as the central issue of the Director-General's Report indicates a real need and is indeed one of the central precepts for which the ILO was established. It is not sufficient to act to protect wages, the physical conditions of work and the health of the active worker. We must concern ourselves with the material life of the worker and his family when he is prevented from continuing to work, be it for reasons depending on the worker himself or due to circumstances beyond his control. In the first case, if he is injured at the workplace and has to cease working for a long or short period, or when he retires, having reached retirement age, or, in the second case, for external reasons as a result of the lack of employment, either because of the closure of his place of work or bankruptcy.

The Histadrut in Israel, which I have the honour to represent at this important Conference, is a general federation of workers. The "generality" of its title reflects not only the fact that it represents about 75 per cent of the population of Israel, but also the fundamental principle that narrow union activities do not suffice for a workers' movement which should also be a strong organization economically and also provide a wide range of social services to its members. Social security is only one of the four pillars which support the structure of the Histadrut. The others are: trade union activities, the labour economy and educational and cultural activities.

Because of the important status of the Histadrut in the social structure of Israel, nurturing social security has become one of the main objectives of Israel as a State. Therefore, there are today in Israel three main systems of social security: by virtue of the law; by virtue of collective agreements; and through regular savings. Compulsory social security exists by virtue of the National Insurance Law, which was passed as long ago as 1954 and has since been revised and expanded. The employee pays 5.35 per cent of his wage to the National Insurance Institute and the employer doubles this amount. The Government, however, has decided to take upon itself part of this payment in order to reduce labour costs. In certain branches, all the financing is provided by the Government. The main branches of the National Insurance Institute are as follows: insurance for victims of work injury and those on the way to or from work, which takes care of the support of the worker during a period when he is prevented from working; general disability pension, rehabilitation and mobility for those with restricted movement; maternity insurance, maternity grant, hospitalization grant, allowance for the period of 12 weeks; child allowance (from the first child); unemployment insurance for a period of six months, when the Employment Service is unable to find work for the unemployed in their profession or at their wage level; the weakest segments of society, or in the case of the unemployed, the family of the worker, have the right to guaranteed income support at a minimum level of 20 to 40 per cent of the average wage in the economy; the youngest insurance branch is that which ensures the maintenance of the worker's rights in the case of bankruptcy of the employer and insolvency of the enterprise. Important branches are: old-age pension, to which every worker is entitled, starting from age 65 for men and 60 for women; and survivors' insurance. But these allowances are flat and low, while the pensions come mainly from the pension funds.

In Israel, the collective agreement has an abiding force by virtue of extension orders issued by the Ministry of Labour. These agreements guarantee a pension for the workers, according to their accumulated rights. In most cases the pension is comprehensive, and for its support the workers contribute 5.5 per cent of their wages and the employer 12 per cent.

The main insurances are: old-age pension, for a maximum of 70 per cent of the wage of 35 years' work; survivors also have the right to this pension according to a special scale; pension for disability or partial or total loss of the power to work; mainly in branches where the labour is on a daily basis, there is a cover of sickness or vacation benefit; the employer also defrays to the pension fund most of the money to cover severance pay. The law in Israel stipulates that the worker has the right to lay-off compensation in the amount of one month's pay for every year's work.

The great majority of the insured in pensions in Israel are members of the seven Histadrut pension funds, whose function is to take care of the rights of the workers. Unlike other pension funds which are built on accumulation of savings, the Histadrut pension funds are based on the principle that the new generation of insured supports the old.

From our accumulated experience we believe that it would be desirable to aspire to the unification of all pension funds so that their actuarial immunity will not be adversely affected by fluctuations in the numbers of workers in a particular branch.

Allow me to say a few words on subjects discussed this year in the technical committees. Part-time work might harm certain rights of workers. While most of the workers in part-time employment are women, their situation, already difficult, might become even worse. Part-time work also prevents advancement and suitable career development, and, once more, working women are victims. The ILO has done well to address this important issue by recommending the adoption of a Convention which Histadrut wholeheartedly supports.

On the subject of the prevention of major industrial accidents, in the not too distant past we have witnessed three tremendous disasters. It is worth observing that they were caused by a combination of three factors: faulty maintenance and poor physical structures, both worsened by natural forces. In Bhopal, the disaster involved a dilapidated plant where little attention was paid to safety systems, aggravated by contact with water; at Chernobyl, the first two factors were further aggravated by winds which spread a radioactive cloud; and more recently, a toy factory in Thailand – an antiquated factory, built in bad conditions – where there had been previous fires and yet one more fire broke out. In all three, the factors are similar. On the one hand, enterprises seeking profit transfer dangerous plants to low wage countries where working conditions are appalling and where little attention is paid to safety. On the other hand, inadequate attention is paid to potential natural forces. We can only hope that employers all over the world have realized that this may be compared to an infectious disease. They are all vulnerable.

A similar phenomenon, the increasing internationalization of capital, accompanied by denial of the right of association and strike, and the transfer of plants to the Third World, is taking place. The founders of the ILO, having perceived the underlying danger, called for the internationalization of the concern for the workers' welfare. The resources for this activity must be found. It is important to recall that poverty and injustice in one country threaten not only the peace and stability of that country but also those of many others.

Original Spanish: Mr. QUINTANA GARCIA (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Cuba) – I should like to congratulate the President, on behalf of the Cuban workers represented by the Confederation of Cuban Workers, on his election to chair this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The decision of the Director-General to devote his Report to so sensitive a human issue as social security was an apt one, particularly at a time when, day by day, as a result of the implementation of new economic experiments – first and foremost among them, neo-liberal policies – more and more workers are without employment, without protection, without any economic protection enabling them or their families to cope with the ever-growing cost of living.

Our point of departure on this issue is the principle that social security is a right of the worker, as is the right to work itself and it is the State which has the major responsibility for guaranteeing social security systems which cover, first and foremost, all the workers and which are progressively extended to their families and to the population as a whole.

We cannot conceive of a State, whatever its type of social security scheme, which does not fulfil or which minimizes its role in such an important area. We do not believe the arguments which are becoming more and more common that social security is a burden which the State cannot shoulder and that privatization is the answer to the problem. There can be nothing of greater value for a Government or a State than its people. Therefore, everything that is done for the well-being and tranquillity of the people will never be enough.

As the State develops and progresses, so social security systems must be extended and developed.

We are convinced that there is no single formula that can be applied to all countries to achieve this goal. Each country must implement its own development policies in accordance with its own needs, its freely chosen social system and with the respect of the entire international community as regards its right to decide on its own destiny. But there are principles which we do believe are universal and one of them is that social development must go hand in hand with economic development.

The separation of these two aspects in the economic policies of many countries has contributed substantially to the deterioration of social security systems, particularly when economic development is planned at the expense of social development, as is the case with the recipes or formulas imposed by international financial institutions on poor countries.

Many workers and retired persons in general are demanding just and decent treatment, not to live in luxury or opulence, but simply to live and to have the right to work, to receive education and to be able to educate their children; to receive health care and be able to retire in peace and tranquillity, as is the case with millions of inhabitants in Latin America who live in poverty, although each and every one of them labours under a burden of around $1,000 of external debt.

In our experience, with the right mix of economic and social development since 1959, the Cuban workers have been fully satisfied with our social security system. Before that date the insurance system covered only 46 per cent of the active population and it was funded by the contributions from the workers themselves. Today, however, it is the State which is responsible for social security expenditure and it protects not only the worker and his family but 100 per cent of the population through social security and assistance.

Before 1959, workers were entitled to only nine days' sick leave a year and only three days in any given month. Today not only is the worker protected against such contingencies for as long as is necessary but he is also covered in respect of occupational accidents and diseases and, in the case of women, maternity protection.

The extension and improvement of social security has been a constant concern of the Cuban trade union movement which has been fully heard and heeded by the revolutionary Government.

In concluding, I wish to reiterate that the Cuban workers are fully satisfied with our social security regime. But we are also very concerned that the enormous effort being made should be maintained so that not a single worker remains uncovered as a result of exceptional conditions now facing the country and which are due to external factors, mainly to the economic, commercial and financial blockade that a super-power has been applying in Cuba for more than 30 years and which each day is becoming increasingly irrational and is a violation of the most elementary rules of international coexistence and an offence to human rights and human dignity.

Currently, the blockade pursues the sole objective of eliminating a people simply because of its wish to maintain and defend its right to self-determination from attempts at interference, which is now becoming more and more acute with the adoption of the Toriceli law which goes even further and undermines the sovereignty of other countries.

Mr. MABUMO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique) – On behalf of the Organization of Workers of Mozambique (OTM) permit me to extend my warm greetings and congratulations to Mr Abdel-Hak on his unanimous election to the presidency of this august International Labour Conference. We are confident that under his experienced leadership and tolerant guidance this Conference will be led through a constructive debate that will culminate with effective substantive conclusions.

We would also like to congratulate the Director-General and his staff for producing comprehensive, analytical and highly informative documents and reports to facilitate the work of this session of the Conference.

Our agenda is very challenging, not only because of the number of items proposed for discussion, but above all because of the importance and complexity of these items.

We believe that the social factor and the social dimension depend directly on the product of the economic process.

In general, the productive capacity in most developing countries remains extremely low and that is responsible for the real incapacity to have a minimum social level compatible with the basic needs of the population, particularly the vulnerable groups.

In my country, Mozambique, the military aggression which we have endured for the last 16 years destroyed health centres and schools. Economic production was also heavily affected by the destruction of economic infrastructure, forcing a large rural population to live as displaced people, without employment, or as refugees in the neighbouring countries without even basic social services.

Today, Mozambican people are hopeful for the future as a result of the general peace agreement signed between my Government and Renamo.

We have big challenges before us – basically the integration into civil and productive society of thousands of demobilized soldiers, who urgently need adult education and vocational training to acquire new skills; and the creation of jobs for the returning refugees, displaced workers and migrant workers returning from the former German Democratic Republic. In order to meet these challenges, we appeal to the ILO and the international community to assist us with financial and material resources in our national reconstruction period because we know that without international assistance we cannot fully implement our projects.

We recognize the efforts undertaken by the Government to enact legislation guaranteeing minimum social security and social protection. Our trade union movement also promotes activities which ensure that the social factor will not be ignored in the workplace.

As regards measures of protection against industrial accidents, the Organization of Workers of Mozambique fights energetically against the sloppiness of employers who are motivated only by greed and easy profits. Our trade union action aims at ensuring that the employers comply with their obligations under social security legislation. It is in these areas where trade unions have to fight and obtain positive results.

There is no doubt that at the international level, even under the present difficult conditions, there are still some possibilities to do more so that society will treat workers with respect and give meaning to the slogan: " A worker is a vital element of production ". In our opinion that means urgently taking measures so that governments and employers fulfil their responsibilities. We must leave the era in which the most powerful dominate, the law of the jungle, and enter a period where the common interest prevails – a civilized period.

The importance, contents and complexity of the social dimension make it a thermometer that indicates the health of a given society. The social dimension demands the existence of a productive economy and the means to meet the basic needs of the citizens.

We witness today that the world economy is sick, gravely sick. In one hemisphere there is enormous capacity of production and trade, but in the other hemisphere there is overwhelming misery and very little trade. The social dimension, which should be the normal result of equilibrium between the two hemispheres, is at an impasse.

The ILO is a well-known organization on our planet – a forum to analyse and recommend solutions to world labour problems, an agent to act in accordance with its mandate to help the world economy to fulfil its fundamental function: to produce in order to satisfy the basic needs of all people, with a balance at the world level. The labour force lives for a sound economy; for that reason the social factor will be what it should be: a normal and logical consequence of a balanced society.

Mr. KORALSKI (Employers' delegate, Bulgaria) – The transition from a centrally planned to a market economy has proved to be the greatest challenge to the social security system Bulgaria has experienced for 100 years now. Most of the conditions for a stable and progressive social security network mentioned in Mr. Hansenne's Report will not exist in Bulgaria in 1993.

Unemployment has reached 16 per cent of the workforce and is likely to creep up. Instead of economic growth, Bulgaria has been experiencing a substantial decline (one of the worst in Eastern Europe) for the third year running. The country has neither well-established financial markets nor relevant financial institutions.

Tax reform is in its infancy. Bulgaria has managed to develop democratic political structures but their stability is to a great extent undermined by the fierce politicization of society. Against this background, we have pinned our hopes on the re-introduction of a tripartite system as the main vehicle for social dialogue. This has already been laid down in legislation and voted into the country's Labour Code.

At the end of 1991 the social partners agreed in principle on the main trends and stages for the reform of the social security system:

(1) The establishment of a modern system for management and control, to keep up with the ongoing changes in the structure and management of the economy in the forms of business activity and in employment patterns.

(2) A new funding scheme that will shift the main financial burden from employers and divide it more fairly among all subjects to the social security process.

(3) Changes in the procedure, terms and amount of social security payments to avoid the existing deformations mentioned in Mr. Hansenne's Report.

(4) The establishment of private and professional social security schemes to reflect the individual and corporate interests of different social groups.

A package of laws, drafted with the help of experts from the ILO, ISSA, the World Bank and other institutions, has failed to reach Parliament. The Government in office in 1992 not only dissolved the tripartite council but also blocked all projects previously approved by it, including the laws on social security, employment and others. These laws have been given priority by the cabinet of Prime Minister Lyuben Berov and we hope that they will pass through Parliament soon.

If these laws are approved by Parliament, the Union for Private Economic Enterprise (UPEE) will be able to implement its project for a private pension fund advanced at the union's Third Congress in 1992. As an independent and non-political association of private enterprises in Bulgaria, the union is very well aware of its responsibility for creating appropriate mechanisms to ensure the well-being of both the emerging class of entrepreneurs in Bulgaria and the employees in the steadily growing private sector of the economy.

The scheme envisages the provision of compensatory payments based on the full capitalization of social security contributions.

To make such a project viable, however, tax and other financial concessions promoting the accumulation of capital in such funds should be made available. If adopted, this approach will have a positive anti-inflationary effect, easing the pressure on the free capital market. At the same time, the capital concentrated in pension funds will create additional investment resources, which is of particular significance at the present stage when investment demand greatly exceeds supply, particularly in Bulgaria.

In the countries of Eastern Europe, with their poorly developed tax administration and imperfect tax legislation, pension funds can be much more easily controlled by government bodies than by the thousands of small depositors. This control is undoubtedly necessary, mostly as a guarantee against possible misappropriation and for ensuring the well-being of contributors. The main guarantee, however, is provided by the democratic principles of managing such funds, the transparency of all activities and the provision of complete and regular information to their members.

The political and economic changes that have shaken the world at the end of this century are putting us all to the test. Aspiring to create a better world, our countries and our organizations can and should prove the power of social dialogue.

No matter where we stand on the road to establishing our social security systems, we need to join hands, using the potential and the great authority of the International Labour Organization, an organization of tripartism, social justice and human rights.

Mr. SATA (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Zambia) – I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the womenfolk on their highest achievement in Canada where, for the first time, a woman has been elected Prime Minister. Another woman has been elected in Turkey, and I hope the ILO will be able next year to invite one of the ladies to come and address us.

Permit me, on behalf of the Zambian Government, the Zambian delegation, and indeed on my own behalf to congratulate warmly the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election which is a great honour both to himself, his country and indeed to Africa. We are confident that with his vast experience he will guide this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion. I also wish to pay a special tribute to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election to the high office of Director-General. I wish him further success. I also wish to compliment the Director-General and the staff of the International Labour Office for producing reports focused on the social welfare of mankind and giving a detailed account of the activities of the International Labour Organization during 1992.

Allow me at the outset to reaffirm my country's commitment to the fundamental ideals of the International Labour Organization. The Preamble to the ILO Constitution says that "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice". We subscribe to this ideal. The Zambian Government is committed to the protection of fundamental human rights and freedom, the promotion of justice and equality among all the people without distinction and maintenance of the rule of law.

The main task of the ILO from its inception was to improve conditions of life and work, inter alia, the building of a comprehensive code of law and practice. This is the function that the ILO still performs with success and that has given the Organization so much significance. However, it has long been realized that to formulate standards is one thing and to have such instruments implemented is another. The importance and significance of international standards lie more in their being implemented and therefore in their effect on social development, and not so much in the instruments themselves.

We in the developing world desire a great amount of assistance from the ILO. This assistance should not only be in terms of guidance, through the standards established on social questions as laid down in various Conventions and Recommendations. It must consist more significantly of technical assistance such as the ILO has been able to give either independently or in conjunction with other international agencies, bilateral or multilateral donors, geared to fostering understanding of the social benefits that development efforts can derive from complying with international labour standards.

My country has been a beneficiary of various forms of ILO assistance in the past, and I should like to take this opportunity to commend the ILO for coming to our assistance and offering expertise in many fields. Currently, we are discussing with the Office how to formulate ideas for assistance, to enhance productivity and, indeed, to establish comprehensive social security arrangements in my country.

My delegation welcomes the inclusion on the agenda of this session items on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation and the development of systems of social security and social protection. This is extremely timely for us. The inclusion of these two items at the height of economic structural adjustment in many developing countries is most beneficial and appropriate at this point in time.

In Zambia, and indeed in many developing countries where structural adjustment programmes have been put in place, the removal of subsidies, price controls and other social protection measures have brought misery to the workers and the entire population. Consequently, many people have to look to social security for protection. Additionally, the general economic squeeze is forcing industries to shut down and reduce their labour force. This has a direct bearing on the funding capacities of social security schemes as the ratio of contributors to beneficiaries will always be in favour of the latter. It becomes imperative therefore that social security reform programmes should take these issues into consideration at the planning stage.

The pressure arising from adverse economic reforms, particularly in developing countries, as consequences of programmes of economic stabilization and structural adjustments involved in the transition from a planned to a market-oriented economy causes people in many countries to look to their governments for basic forms of social security and protection. Owing to the burden of economic adjustment on the population of many developing countries, and more so on the poor, social security systems tend to be pyramidal with a small number of people at the top getting better benefits with those in the private and informal sectors and rural areas receiving little or nothing at all.

Developing countries in particular face a very serious challenge to offer sound and adequate social security and protection systems to their people. This is due to: rising national debts; adverse balance of payments; collapse of commodity prices on the world market; unsatisfactory or harsh conditions from donor countries; and, in some cases, inefficiency in the management, administration and operation of institutions of social security.

These are challenges inhibiting the developing countries from offering adequate social security and protection to our people, with resulting simmering social tension and hostility to political systems and government, thereby threatening the fragile, recently acquired, democracy. It is with the realization of the foregoing factors that we, in Zambia, recognize the need to have a comprehensive social security scheme to provide wider coverage, improved benefits, smoothly coordinated and better levels of protection for our people. The new Zambian Government has thus taken pragmatic measures towards the realization of this goal. A Department of Social Security has recently been created within my Ministry to spearhead the implementation of the programmes with emphasis on transforming the structure of the existing Provident Fund into a full-fledged social security scheme and the Workmen's and Pneumoconiosis Compensation Fund Boards into a social protection scheme. Zambia realizes that, to attain its policy objectives, hurdles within our economic restructuring programme have to be resolutely overcome. It is our hope that the programme will take root with the cooperation of the workers, employers, and indeed the Government, so as to improve the lot of our people who have been hitherto disadvantaged in as far as the social security system and social protection are concerned. We are therefore grateful to both the ILO and the UNDP for agreeing to consider offering us some technical assistance in this direction.

Comprehensive social security administration is a new concept in developing countries and in Zambia in particular. As a result, there are very few indigenous nationals trained in this field. It is for this reason that we have to appeal to the ILO for technical advice, expertise and training opportunities for our people.

The Director-General in his Report has aptly made reference to the significance of unemployment compensation and the social safety net in the light of the economic evolution introduced in many developing nations. In many of our countries, the unemployment rate is growing at a very alarming rate making it difficult, if not impossible, to introduce any unemployment benefits. In Zambia a high percentage of the labour force is unemployed in the formal sector. In addition, an average of 150,000 school-leavers join the pool of the unemployed every year. As a consequence of the structural adjustment and privatization policies, over 80,000 employees will be retrenched from both the civil and parastatal services, adding to the already large pool of unemployed. The problem is further compounded by the high rates of population growth in the country ranging from 3 to 3.6 per cent per year.

When this rather bleak scenario is viewed against the generally poor rate of economic growth in the country, the stage is set for a potentially explosive economic, social and political situation. Economically it points to increasing poverty and deterioration in the standard of living for the retrenched people. Socially it is a recipe for proliferation of crime, disease, corruption, immorality, broken homes and other social evils. Politically, it culminates in dissatisfaction, discontentment, as well as distrust of the status quo, finally breeding political instability with its ghastly human rights abuse, a threat to freedom of speech and democracy.

These are serious emotional and sensitive failings for a new government such as ours riding on the popularity of electoral promises still fresh in the people's minds. Unless they are handled with utmost care, such deficiencies can spell serious difficulties for any country. Hence the significance of developing programmes aimed at ameliorating the social, economic and political impact of retrenchment and privatization.

The Zambian Government has recognized the need for measures to contain the social impact of the public and parastatal sector reform programmes. Pursuant to this the Government has initiated efforts to develop and institutionalize an entrepreneurship development project to benefit retrenched personnel. The scheme would involve counselling, job search services, training for business development, etc.

The Report of the Director-General on the Activities of the ILO, 1992 shows significant achievements over the past 12 months. These achievements were made against a background of political, economic and social difficulties. Indeed, given the universal nature of the goals set before the ILO since its inception, given also specific obligations under its charter to participate fully in the war against poverty, the ILO obviously has a significant role to play in the great challenge of the underdeveloped world. The bulk of its technical cooperation projects must continue to be geared towards the task of assisting countries develop, train and employ their human resources for development purposes. Vocational training should loom large in these programmes, for the basic problem in many of our developing countries, including Zambia, is the disparity between a great abundance of manpower and shortage of modern skills. It is necessary for social and economic reasons to impart the skills that will enable many people to enter the productive economy of their countries. ILO assistance in such fields as management development, productivity, cooperatives, social security, labour management relations and small scale industries must continue to be rendered in the quest to conquer hunger, poverty and disease in order to make mankind's life more worth while.

Finally, Zambia, like other developing countries, has taken advantage of the ILO's technical assistance to improve the implementation of international labour Conventions. Technical assistance has been given to my country in various spheres of economic activity. To this end, on behalf of my country, I again thank the International Labour Organization for this valuable assistance and implore the Organization to continue assisting my country in an effort to make Zambia a better place economically and socially. May I take this opportunity to plead with member States of the ILO to give the Organization every support in realizing its ideals as contained in its Constitution.

Original Spanish: Mr. MORENO (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) – May I begin by extending my congratulations to the President on his election to guide the work of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are confident that his experience and great competence will ensure the best possible outcome to our deliberations.

This year the Director-General's Report deals most aptly with an issue which is a very sensitive one in our developing countries.

The issue of social security and its future are of great concern to trade union leaders and workers the world over.

Undoubtedly, the International Labour Organization has in the past few years made tremendous efforts to influence positively national policies and State decisions in this area. The ILO has not confined itself merely to checking whether the pertinent international legal instruments are being implemented, but has actively engaged in promoting new approaches to social security, which emphasize its importance and extend its scope to new groups within our societies.

As the Director-General says in his Report, a State has a basic duty to guarantee a minimum standard of living for its people, and we fully agree with this view. We the Nicaraguan workers are against programmes to privatize social security which are based solely on the demands of international financial institutions, and which fail to take account of the specific characteristics of the Third World.

The general logic of these so-called structural adjustment plans which have been placed on our countries is to provide for the privatization of major spheres of basic services to the people and which by definition are undeniably the responsibility of the State. Attempts have been made to convince us that a social security system controlled by private initiative is more beneficial than the traditional system administered by the public authorities. The truth is that up to now, there are no real examples in the Third World of these highly publicized advantages of private social security.

Governments do of course complain about the lack of resources to meet their responsibilities under social security schemes, but this lack of funds to meet the people's needs are structural in origin and cannot simply be resolved by privatizing so sensitive a sector.

The adjustment plans being implemented by our governments are set within a logic of economic contradictions which cannot be solved merely by privatization policies. The international financial institutions maintain that with these programmes they are financing our long-term development, but what they are doing is brutally undermining the fragile economic structure of our societies.

The trend towards the privatization of social security is just one expression of this relentless economic logic which, in the pursuit of unrealistic economic recovery objectives, has inflicted unemployment, misery and absolute despair on our societies.

In Latin America and particularly in Nicaragua, the structural adjustment panacea has also sold well and, unfortunately, the State has been compelled to buy it owing to the immoral conditions of international finance. Today we are seeing the results. According to the last United Nations Human Development Report, the basic needs of 69 per cent of the population in Nicaragua are not met. Of this 69 per cent, 30.6 per cent live in poverty, 22.7 per cent in extreme poverty and 16.1 per cent in total destitution. Regardless of the contradictory figures on unemployment, if we take the statistics of our Ministry of Labour from January 1993, 54 per cent of the economically active population is unemployed, which gives your a clear idea of the social disaster besetting our country.

True, inflation has been reduced to zero, but at unprecedented human and social cost. The sickness has been eliminated by killing off the patient. Of course the workers have reacted against this, regardless of their different trade union or ideological position, and are fighting to maintain their labour rights. Social conflicts are breaking out, often accompanied by violence and police repression, a practice which must be eliminated if democracy is not to be stifled.

In this context, social security too has clearly felt the impact of this general economic logic whose risks and foreseeable consequences are dealt with most competently in the Director-General's Report. Pensions are maintained at insignificant levels and services are absurd in comparison with the revenue collected. The planned reforms of the social security system in Nicaragua, far from achieving any real reform, are in keeping with the economic logic of the structural reforms and seek to reduce benefits and maternity leave, increase contributions deducted from workers and substantially cut the present rate of pensions for orphans and retired persons. This planned reform is so harmful that initially it was even rejected by certain private and public entities which are responsible for implementing the State's labour policy.

To have an idea of the general state in which these structural adjustment plans have left the Nicaraguan economy, it is sufficient to look through the window of social security to see the extent of the social damage and the threat hanging over insured workers.

Many people tell us that this is only temporary. They want to sell us the idea that the sacrifices today will ensure prosperity tomorrow, but realities are belying the promises of politicians and technocrats and everyday we, the workers, are living in worse conditions where the hope of improvement is becoming more remote.

Certainly, social security is one of the last bulwarks of a State policy of responsibility to the least protected groups, and we must not allow an economic policy which has had questionable results for most of our countries to swallow up this achievement too. We must halt the logic of international financial schemes imposed on us which offer remedies which cannot solve the crisis of the workers. In Nicaragua, things have reached such a point that the World Bank is now putting pressure on the Government of Nicaragua not to promulgate a new Labour Code. Another example of this unacceptable blackmail is the threat by the Central American Bank of Economic Integration to withdraw from the country if it continues to be asked to pay compensation to workers who today are suffering serious illness due to chemical contamination in enterprises financed by this entity, as in the sad and well-known case with PENWALT in Central America. The Nicaraguan workers reject the economic logic of these international financial institutions which are imposing economic formulas in which we the workers always count the least. Especially disadvantaged in this respect are women workers who are also the victims of traditional sexual discrimination, discrimination at work and sexual harassment. An unfortunate example is the prison-like regime of enterprises in what is called the industrial free zone funded with foreign capital. In Nicaragua we need and we want foreign investment for our development, but never at the cost of our dignity and our most basic trade union rights.

In such circumstances the struggle to prevent social security from becoming in the space of a few years yet another lost battle of the twentieth century must be firm. It is a struggle which goes beyond national boundaries and clearly the International Labour Organization has a fundamental role to play here. We therefore express before this world parliament of labour our conviction that the ILO will once again be able meet the historic demands facing us in such difficult times.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – Please allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved election.

On behalf of African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and on my own behalf, I also congratulate the Director-General Mr. Michel Hansenne on his election by the Governing Body for a second term. I wish him success and God's guidance and abiding grace in the discharge of his duties.

The Director-General's Reports are comprehensive and excellent. The activities of the ILO in its areas of competence have become, for us Africans, as for people in other parts of the world, indispensable and very highly appreciated.

The major tasks of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and its affiliates in all the 52 African countries are: the reinforcement of the democratization process through popular participation; the economic development of the continent through the application of people-centred, development-oriented, self-sustaining economic policies; and the economic integration of Africa as enunciated in he Treaty establishing the African Economic Community.

The tools we use for these three major tasks are human resources development among our members and the capacity-building of our organizations.

It is a matter of pride for us that affiliates of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity have been in the vanguard of democratic change in several African countries. In the process, some African trade union leaders, like Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council (SATUCC) established by the OATUU in 1983, have been jailed by the Malawi Government. He was released only recently. Others have suffered harassment and detention. Our members have not been deterred by the conduct of forces opposed to democratic change in Africa. They are fortified in their belief that there can be no development without democracy, nor can there be democracy without development.

The Organization of African Trade Union Unity and its affiliates throughout Africa have been strong opponents of the orthodox structural adjustment programmes of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, which the two Bretton Woods institutions have been imposing without any justification on African countries. Their policies in Africa over the past ten years have caused millions of deaths, over 10 million jobs, the destruction of thousands of industries, have quadrupled the debts, and increased poverty and political instability in our continent. In a recent speech to the Annual Conference of the African-American Institute, which was published in the International Herald Tribune of 22-23 May 1993, Mr. Edward V. K. Jaycox, Vice-President of the World Bank for the African Region said: "The Bank would no longer dictate development plans to African countries and would stop 'imposing' foreign expertise on reluctant African governments."

He called the Bank's current pattern of technical assistance to Africa "a systematic, destructive force", and said that future programmes would be aimed at building Africa's capacity to help itself.

I, on behalf of African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, wrote a seven-page rejoinder to Jaycox's statement, and copies were sent to the Heads of State of the Group of Seven Industrialized Countries (G7), the United Nations Secretary-General, the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the Director-General of the ILO.

Our organization supports the use of the OAU-adopted African Alternative Framework to Structural Adjustment Programmes for Socio-Economic Development and Transformation, otherwise known as AAF-SAP, as the basis for the democratic design of structural adjustment programmes in each African country. The right of countries to determine their economic paths is not only inalienable, but should also be respected by everybody.

With the assistance of the ILO and the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, several seminars have been held for African trade union readers on the African Alternative Framework to Structural Adjustment Programmes.

The globalization of world trade has made it incumbent upon us in Africa to support and actively promote Africa's economic integration. In view of the urgent need for integration, African workers, under the banner of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, have been putting pressure on African Governments and the Organization of African Unity to speed up the process of Africa's economic integration which will lead to the establishment of the African Economic Community. We are convinced that rapid development and prosperity Africa can only be achieved through economic integration.

In my speech at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference I asked for the assistance of the ILO for the human resources development of our members and the capacity-building of our organizations. I am happy to report that the Director-General, through the African Regional Office of the ILO and the Rural Employment, Workers' Education and Safety and Health Branches of the ILO, assisted in the training of many of our members through fellowships, seminars, workshops and conferences.

In order to promote dialogue and understanding between African trade unions, the IMF and the World Bank, the ILO also contributed financially and technically to the organization of the High-Level Policy Conference on Structural Adjustment and African Trade Unions which was held in Cairo, Egypt, from 16 to 18 April 1993. The quality of the technical papers presented by our organization, the ILO, the OAU, the IMF, the World Bank, the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, and the African Development Bank, and the high quality of the debate by the participants at the Cairo Conference, contributed immensely to its success. The unanimous decision by all the participants for a High-Level African Tripartite Conference on Structural Adjustment in 1994 should be technically and financially supported by the ILO. There is also an urgent need for social dialogue in African countries to achieve national consensus on the objectives of structural adjustment, and for the involvement and effective participation by workers and employers in the design, implementation, management and monitoring of structural adjustment programmes.

African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity still need the massive assistance of the ILO and all its technical branches in the vital areas of human resources development and capacity-building. These include: fellowships for training in project design, training of health and safety specialists, environment and computer literacy; and also workshops and seminars on structural adjustment, development strategies, workers' education, popular participation, development and strengthening of trade union cooperatives and the capacity-building of our organizations through the provision of technical equipment, and so forth.

Before I conclude, I would like to express our gratitude to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, his deputies, the Assistant Director-General for ILO Activities in Africa, the Director of the Workers' Activities Bureau, the Chief of the Workers' Education Branch and the heads of technical branches of the ILO for their cooperation.

Mr. EDSTROM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) – Permit me to congratulate the President on his election.

For almost 75 years the ILO has played an important role in achieving better social security and social protection. These achievements are pointed out in the Report of the Director-General.

In my view, however, the Report paints too bright a picture of today's situation and of the future. The social protection systems in most of the developed countries are going backwards and the Welfare State is being threatened on various fronts. Unemployment in Europe has become fixed at a high level, with nearly half of those out of work being long-term unemployed. Many of them have minimum chances of returning to production in their lifetimes.

The high unemployment rate also impedes demands for equality between the sexes. Only 54 per cent of European women are part of the workforce, and many of them are forced against their will to work part time. The number of Europeans with atypical employment contracts has increased and now includes 14 million part-time workers and 10 million with temporary contracts. Atypical employment contracts allow the employers to avoid paying contributions to the employees' social security systems.

Cutbacks in social welfare systems are taking place in most countries. Unemployment benefits, sickness benefits and disability and old-age pensions are being reduced. The welfare systems are being restructured so that workers have to pay an increasing part of the contributions to their insurance and social services – if they can afford it. These cutbacks are mostly in response to operating budget deficits – deficits caused by unemployment and made worse by plummeting tax revenues from working people.

Unemployment is costly, not only for the individual worker suffering from economic difficulties and physical and mental stress, but also for States. In Europe over 100 billion ECU are spent on passive cash payments to the unemployed. The lesson to be learnt once again is that no country is so rich that it can afford unemployment.

In my country, Sweden, the unemployment rate has risen from 1.5 per cent in 1989 to nearly 8 per cent this year. Economic growth has been negative in recent years. The Government that took office in 1991 has made great efforts to turn the universal Swedish model of social protection into a model where workers should get only basic protection and where those who can afford it are free to choose their own private arrangements for social protection. Cutbacks in the general social welfare system are an important element of this approach. However, it is the firm belief of the Swedish trade unions that this model, that has been tried elsewhere, is doomed to failure in our country too.

The Swedish trade unions have earlier this year sent a complaint to the Director-General concerning a violation by Sweden of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121). By introducing a waiting period in the work injury insurance and by redefining the concept of work injury, the Government has changed its policy such that ILO standards are no longer met. This is a situation which we deeply deplore. Measures have also been taken to dismantle tripartite structures and revise labour legislation. One issue concerns attempts to change the definition of a worker. The purpose is to make a larger proportion of the workforce self-employed contractors, who are not entitled to the same security of social protection in terms of employment as are workers. The possibility for employers to circumvent their obligations stemming from labour laws will thereby increase drastically.

In the social area, in general, we believe that the course to be followed must be based on the following principles:

First, the fundamental principle of social policy should be a general welfare policy, based on everyone's right to compensation when they suffer loss of income or illness, or when they reach old age.

Secondly, the social and political system must be developed so as to allow free mobility in the labour market. General systems basically allow greater freedom for people to choose their employment and education.

Thirdly, a basic principle should be that each citizen should independently be entitled to social benefits. This is especially important as it relates to gender.

Fourthly, people defining welfare policy must be more conscious of changes in the population.

Fifthly, minimum wages must never be allowed to become a dominant part of social policy. Such solutions should as far as possible be minimized, firstly by means of a policy for good conditions of pay and full employment, and secondly by giving the basic social policy systems sufficiently high benefit levels and coverage.

Sixthly, in order to meet growing social needs, the public sector must be transformed. This does not mean cutting benefits, nor does it call for privatization. What it should mean is building up efficient systems which work in support of a coherent view of the economy – systems that develop the active sides of welfare policy, in order to keep down the passive payments of cash benefits.

Mr. CHAROENWAL (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Thailand) – On behalf of the workers and trade union movement of Thailand, I wish to convey my best regards to the President.

In Thailand we face rapidly changing political and socio-economic conditions which are related to our increasing integration in the world economy. This causes dramatic adjustments in the labour market with a far-reaching impact on the living and working conditions of workers.

May I take this opportunity to give some general views of and information on the workers and their situation in Thailand.

Occupational safety and health issues: Less than one year ago we re-established a democratic environment as a precondition for the implementation of basic workers' rights. I recall the bloody incident in May 1992 when the military used weapons to suppress workers who demonstrated peacefully for their democratic rights. One year later, on 10 May 1993, Thai workers suffered another tragic incident: 188 workers were killed, and about 500 were injured during a fire at the Kader Industrial Toy Factory, the biggest tragedy of its kind in the history of industrial development. The owners of the company are from Taiwan and Hong Kong. We did not see any action taken by the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health which is supported financially by the ILO.

There are still too many workers in Thailand facing risks similar to those which existed at the Kader factory. The present idea of unlimited cost minimization for maximum profits does not give much consideration to the benefit of workers and their welfare.

After the tragedy at the Kader Toy Factory, we urged our Government and all enterprises to show a greater humanitarian concern for workers and to cooperate more closely with trade unions in the field of safety and health conditions. Both the State and employers should recognize trade unions as accepted representatives of workers in this field among others.

The democratic situation in Thailand: Suffice it to say that the situation is not good even though we have had an elected Government since September 1992. We would like to inform the Director-General that Thailand still has an elected government, but all military regime announcements still apply.

The National Peace Keeping Council (NPKC) in Announcement 54 which restricts basic trade union rights in Thailand is still in force.

Public sector trade union rights: The military Government withdrew public sector trade union rights after the coup d'etat in 1991. The elected government is going to amend the legislation only with regard to the names of organizations, changing them from "association" to "trade union". The rest will remain the same. Public sector workers still have no right to join in activities with private sector workers.

Public sector workers: The rights of these workers to freedom of assembly is not fully respected. Other organizations in Thailand enjoy freedom of assembly at any time they wish, be it an employers' organization, a capitalist organization, or a political party. But, public sectors workers may only hold their general assembly during public holidays. What kind of elected, democratic government do we have?

The violation of trade union rights: The former President of the Labour Congress of Thailand (LCT), Mr. Thanong Podhi-Arn, disappeared in June 1991, during the period of military dictatorship and government and has not been seen since. The right to organize in trade unions is still not fully recognized by many employers.

There are still plenty of cases of violations of trade union rights in Thailand. In order to control workers in the private sector, trade union leaders are still sacked at the drop of a hat. Last year more than 2,000 workers in the Seagate Electronic Company – a multinational company owned by Americans – were sacked only because they tried to organize a trade union there. Even now, workers there are still not organized, as the company has a strong anti-trade union policy.

In the first week of June 1992 the management of the Thai Durable Textile Factory attempted to sack 367 workers, most of them women. This act violated Thai Labour Law, as it was during the collective bargaining negotiation period. The president of the union was also sacked. She had just received the award of Woman of the Year from the Prime Minister. The company justified its action by stating that a section of the factory had to be closed in order to instal high-technology machinery. The owner of the company is Japanese.

Ratification of ILO Conventions: Although Thailand is one of the founder members of the ILO, we would like to inform the Director-General and world society that only 11 ILO Conventions have been ratified by the Government of Thailand. We would like the Director-General to convince the Government of Thailand to ratify ILO Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 111, 135, 141 and 151 in order to improve basic trade union rights in the country.

The income distribution gap: We would like to inform the Director-General of the ILO that although Thailand has enjoyed quite successful economic growth in recent years, the income distribution among the population is still extremely uneven. Rural workers still have no rights to organize and fight for their interests, and their income is still very low. Apart from that, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank play a very important role in controlling the economic development and income distribution of the country. Privatization is recommended to the Government, though it has been proven that privatization policies are one of the main causes of the increasing income distribution gap since the private sector is more profit-oriented. We, on behalf of Thai workers, would like to urge the IMF and World Bank to stop this behaviour immediately in order to secure a better standard of living for the Thai workers and the population in general.

Child labour: Although the Government of Thailand has tried to improve the situation with regard to child labour, little improvement has so far been seen. We would like to inform the Director-General and this session of the Conference that the issue of child labour in Thailand is still neglected. The Government of Thailand has amended legislation increasing the age at which children can work, from 12 to 13 years. But compulsory education for Thai children is approximately until the age of 15, which leads to a contradictory situation.

Social security: It is extremely difficult to understand why the Government of Thailand has exempted State enterprise workers from the social security fund. But the Director-General of the ILO should know the truth – that the military Government does not allow public sector workers to be involved in any activities with the private sector and wants to separate and decrease the Thai labour movement's power and collective bargaining power.

Labour ministry: We would like to take this opportunity to thank the Government of Thailand for its Act on the establishment of the labour ministry at the end of May 1993.

I would like to conclude my speech by taking this opportunity to urge the democratically elected Government of the Kingdom of Thailand to speed up the process of restoring the basic trade union rights which were taken away by the military dictatorship.

Mr. KUTAL (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea) – First of all allow me to place on record my congratulations to the President on his successful election to the chair of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I take this opportunity to acknowledge the commitment and the dedication of the International Labour Office over the past decade in its efforts to ensure that labour standards in the world have improved in accordance with the wishes and the desires of the millions of workers all over the world.

I note that this session of the International Labour Conference will deliberate on some of the important Recommendations and Conventions of the ILO, which also recognizes the current changing global industrial relations, and I am very hopeful that the Conference, in particular the Governments and employers, will support the adoption of these important Conventions and Recommendations before this Conference. I would particularly like to appeal through this Conference to the Government of Papua New Guinea to recognize its responsibilities and obligations as a Member of this great Organization and to take immediate steps to ratify some of the most important outstanding ILO Conventions and Recommendations which have not been ratified by the Government of Papua New Guinea.

It is a responsibility and obligation of each member country of the ILO to ensure that appropriate ILO Conventions and Recommendations which recognize the fundamental rights of all workers throughout the world should be ratified by the respective governments. Accordingly, the Government of Papua New Guinea must ratify the previous ILO Recommendations and Conventions which have not been ratified since Papua New Guinea became a Member of the International Labour Organization in 1975.

I wish to formally advise this Conference of a serious situation that exists in Papua New Guinea today, which is significantly affecting not only the wages but also the living conditions of all wage earners in Papua New Guinea.

In August 1992, an independent Minimum Wages Board recommended that the country's wage structure be totally deregulated and that all wage adjustments be based on productivity and the capacity of the employer to pay. Since 1974, the wage structure in Papua New Guinea has been based on awards and agreements to adjust wages in accordance with percentage increases in the cost of living, which is normally known as the consumer price index in our country. This method of adjustment of wages has been in place during a three-year agreement between the Public Employees' Association of Papua New Guinea and the Government of Papua New Guinea and has been used for an award or a determination for workers in the private sector. These methods of wage structure in the country have been in existence from 1974 until August 1992, when a Minimum Wages Board recommended a total deregulation of wages in the country, which resulted in a reduction of 64 per cent in the real wages of all workers, and established a national minimum wage of approximately US$23 a week.

The cost of living increase and the country's inflation rate is approximately 7 per cent per annum and is not as high as in other developing countries. However, although Papua New Guinea is only a Third World country in the Pacific region, its cost of living, including the standard of living, is amongst the highest in the world. A survey of household basic consumer goods conducted by the Public Employees' Association in 1992 showed that an average worker needs to have or earn over US$100 a week for basic survival. The country's social and economic structure is so expensive that a worker in Papua New Guinea today needs to have a minimum living wage of approximately US$100 a week.

Despite this, the delegation to this Conference is sad to say that the current Government has decided to support the minimum wages board recommendation for a minimum wage of approximately US$23 a week. The Government assumes – I repeat the Government of Papua New Guinea assumes – that a total deregulation of wages from the previous US$65 a week to US$23 a week will encourage an increase of foreign investment and the creation of employment opportunities for the unemployed youth in the country. The employers have argued over the years that the wages in the country are too high for any foreign investment and, further, that the high wage structure has discouraged many employers from actively employing a large labour force. Accordingly, the employers have been pressurizing the Government to reduce wages so that they can increase the level of employment. This is a false assumption because a low wage will not increase overseas investment and create employment opportunities but will only assist employers to get rich at the expense of the workers.

However, since August last year, when the new national minimum wage of US$23 a week was introduced, there has been no sign of any increase in employment of unemployed youth in the country and we believe that if the employers are to employ extra labour, at the rate of US$23 a week, it will certainly create a slavery system and poverty amongst the low income earners in the country. It is a matter of serious concern to the workers in Papua New Guinea today that new national minimum wages of US$23 a week will certainly create a serious poverty problem in all the major urban centres throughout Papua New Guinea, particularly in a country where a worker needs at least US$100 a week for basic survival.

Workers throughout Papua New Guinea today are organizing to resist as far as possible the Government's approval of the new national minimum wage of US$23 a week. The workers are proposing a nationwide strike which is likely to take place at the end of June 1993 or thereabouts. The purpose of the strike will be to demand that the Government reject the adoption of the 1992 Minimum Wages Board determination and that a new board be established to determine an appropriate level of wages in the country. Because of the Government's decision to support the Minimum Wages Board determination, the Government has rejected a three-year wage indexation proposal that the Public Employees' Association submitted to it. The Government, in response, insists that the Public Employees' Association accept the Minimum Wages Board determination as an appropriate method of salary fixation in the public service. The Public Employees' Association has rejected that and, should the Government reject its proposal, the Public Employees' Association proposes to effect a nationwide strike. The workers appeal to the ILO and the United Nations to assist them in this respect.

The Government of Papua New Guinea is in the process of introducing many major new policy initiatives, one of which relates to privatization of government-owned corporations and agencies. The privatization of government-owned corporations and agencies is a project that is being initiated by the Government, with the support of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The effects of such a programme, particularly privatization of essential government institutions such as the National Broadcasting Commission, the National Housing Corporation, and Postal and Telephone Services, will drastically affect the vital services that these institutions provide to the people of the country, and it will further affect thousands of workers, who will be left jobless.

The Government's new policy initiatives, especially the privatization programme, are supported in principle by the workers in Papua New Guinea who believe that privatization must be introduced with caution to ensure that the basic and fundamental services of the people of the country are not affected for the sake of privatization, which is aimed at maximization of profits.

The workers are therefore calling on the International Labour Organization and the United Nations to assist the Government of Papua New Guinea in its privatization programme, as we believe that the involvement of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank will damage the workers and the country's economy. We believe that the Government's plan to privatize the government-owned corporations and agencies with the support of the IMF and the World Bank, will not be in the best interests of the country and its people.

In conclusion, on behalf of the workers of Papua New Guinea, I formally convey an appeal to the International Labour Office and the United Nations to intervene and discourage the Government of Papua New Guinea from introducing a slave-based salary structure that will create poverty in all urban centres of Papua New Guinea.

The workers appeal to the ILO and the United Nations to advise the Government of Papua New Guinea that under the Constitution of Papua New Guinea, as well as under ILO instruments and United Nations resolutions, all workers have a basic right to a decent and affordable standard of living, and workers must accordingly be paid a wage that is equal to the cost of living and ensures their survival, a wage level that enables them to earn and maintain better education, health and other social benefits for their children.

The Government of Papua New Guinea must freely negotiate a separate wage indexation agreement with the Public Employees' Association and the public sector unions, such as the Papua New Guinea Teachers' Association and the Police Association, who have had similar agreements in the past which have worked well for both the Government and the workers. The workers also call upon the ILO to advise and remind the Government of Papua New Guinea that it is its duty and responsibility as a Member of the ILO to ensure that appropriate ILO Conventions and Recommendations are ratified, in accordance with ILO regulations. The Government cannot ignore its duties and responsibilities, as a Member of the ILO and the United Nations, to ratify some of the important ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

Original Spanish: Mr. ETCHEVERRI (Workers' delegate, Paraguay) – The delegation of Paraguayan workers and the Paraguayan Confederation of Labour (CPT), would like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on being elected to guide the work of this important Conference. We should like to wish them every success in discharging their duties.

For the first time, Paraguay is attending this world event with a tripartite delegation, in conformity with the Constitution of the ILO and the Standing Orders of the Conference. This is the result of the new era of democracy which has prevailed in Paraguay since 1989. This process completed its first stage on 9 May last, when the Paraguayan people elected a constitutional president, senators, deputies, governors and councillors in free elections. What good fortune, after almost 150 years of unlawful and anti-democratic regimes which we had to put up with since the time of our independence in 1811.

Paraguay is one of the founding Members of the ILO; despite the fact that, owing to our dictatorships, we did not attend the Conference for more than 18 years, we, the workers, have never ceased to fight for the goals of freedom, social justice, the protection of human, economic, cultural and workers' rights. These were the rights that gave birth to this great institution, the ILO.

Our country, as I said, has completed one phase of its existence and from 15 August next, when the new democratic government will be installed, we will resume our fight for progress and the well-being of our people. Democracy entered Paraguay through the front door and since January 1989 we enjoy broad political, trade union, social and cultural rights, freedom of the press and expression and freedom of assembly.

Certain reactionary employers, bent on neo-liberalism which is obsolete and even more reactionary than they are, however, have not lost time in placing obstacles in the path of democracy. However, the Paraguayan people are prepared to defend and secure their aspirations of bread, peace and freedom. Those who still yearn for dictatorship and totalitarianism do not and will not have any place in the new Paraguay which we are building with the efforts of the men and women of our country.

The historic milestone of 2 and 3 February 1989 – the liberation of Paraguay – fought for by the people, by the CPT and the Paraguayan workers, will always be honoured and defended because it is the source of our new found democratic freedoms.

We are now making ready to embark on a path of democracy, of respect between compatriots, in a quest for the definitive establishment of our great ideals of economic and social development, well-being and justice, through a democratic pact written not on paper, but in the hearts and minds of all Paraguayans. It is a pact for freedom, productive work, harmonious and civilized coexistence which safeguards security, well-being and the happiness of the Paraguayan family, and of all those brothers from other countries who live, work, fight and struggle on our territory. We therefore hope that our new democratic system will make it possible for development and effective social and economic progress to be viable, and enable our people to live without upheavals in genuine freedom in participatory democracy in which the distribution of wealth produced by the worker is a reality and not just a dream.

We should like to congratulate the Director-General on being re-elected and for his Report on ILO activities in 1992. We share his concerns about the urgent need for change and greater efficiency in social security schemes, and in medical and hospital care, in order to preserve and safeguard the health of workers and their families; the strengthening of retirement schemes and benefits. In this context Paraguay, in its new era of democracy, is about to restructure and redefine the very concept of social security. Our Social Welfare Institution (IPS) will be revising its institutional, medical and administrative structures in order to make the necessary adjustments to ensure greater efficiency across the board, including services for senior citizens, domestic and service workers, rural workers and peasants and the many workers in the informal sector.

The universality of Paraguayan social security is both a necessity and a challenge which we in the CPT support resolutely in order to ensure that our compatriots receive the benefits to which they are entitled.

However, Paraguay has not escaped the winds of neo-liberalism which have swept the region with their aim of privatization, including the privatization of medical care and pensions. We the workers reject this with all our might and strength because it seriously undermines the health and economic survival of the workers and their families.

Another source of concern for workers and the CPT is the delay in the promulgation of a new Labour Code. This code has been discussed for four years in Parliament, and for the last six months has been before the Senate. We demand a new Labour Code which establishes the principle of real stability, trade union rights and social guarantees. It must not simply be a code aimed at making labour more flexible, which is merely a misconstruction of what freedom is on the part of employers in order to dismiss and manipulate the workers and trade union leaders.

Lastly, to date Paraguay has ratified only 34 international Conventions; we shall therefore continue to struggle for and demand the ratification of many other Conventions which are of great interest both to the country and the workers.

The new Paraguayan Constitution, promulgated on 20 June 1992, establishes and recognizes our country as a society based on the rule of law; it guarantees all fundamental rights such as freedom of association, collective bargaining, the right to strike, to demonstrate and assemble, the right of the people to propose legislation, respect for tripartism as a means of action, far-reaching and humanistic agrarian reform, pluralism in the media, free expression and respect for ideological diversity, equality for all and equal rights for men and women, as well as free and democratic elections through direct and secret suffrage with proportional representation. It is in this context that we the workers will pursue our struggle for a better Paraguay – a democratic and peaceful Paraguay that respects human dignity.

Mr. ENGLEBERTS (representative of Public Services International) – The 1993 UNDP Human Development Report states that some people claim that recent events prove the triumph of capitalism and the demise of socialism; this is too simplistic a view; if there is a triumph of capitalism, it need not be the triumph of personal greed; if there is a demise of socialism, it need not be the demise of all the social objectives; indeed, such labels inhibit creative thinking and risk repeating the mistakes of the past.

I am afraid that is exactly what the resolutions of the Employers' group and some Asian governments in the ILO will do, repeat the mistakes of the past. In Public Services International we are in favour of reform, but we are very suspicious about some of the ideas behind these resolutions. Particularly if you read a document from the International Organization of Employers from February 1993 containing proposals for a thorough reform of the ILO, you wonder whether they are struck with dogmatic blind-ness. They claim their approach is faithful to the principles laid down in the Preamble to the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, provided they are read in the light of today's world, and their analysis of the light of today's world has more to do with orthodox monetarist theories than with reality.

They claim that policy prescriptions of recent years, based on the preponderant role of the state and the large public enterprises, have failed to realize the hopes expressed in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Where have they been in the last ten years, I ask you? The monetarist decade has been witness to privatization of public assets on an enormous scale and the restructuring of public services by every conceivable means, with one objective – reducing the size of the state and cutting public sector spending in favour of a greater role for the private sector. Has it worked? The 1993 Human Development Report mentions that this was the decade that shattered many lives and hopes, with mounting external debt, faltering economic growth, increasing unemployment, growing civil strife, rising ethnic tensions, threats to the environment and the persistence of abject poverty. More than a billion of the world's people still languish in absolute poverty, and the rich? The rich are getting richer. Asset sales have contributed little or nothing to the economic well-being of those countries where privatization has been extensive. All remain stubbornly in recession. Privatization does not produce economic growth nor does it create jobs. More likely the reverse. A lesson from the monetarist decade is that providing the infrastructure for a modern economy and society is a government responsibility. Abdication of that responsibility results in a rundown of education, health, roads, public buildings and of national morale and social values.

Employers, do your homework. Read the UNDP report which talks about the seven sins of privatization. Read the 1991 OECD publication Serving the economy better, read the 1991 World Development Report of the World Bank, which notes for example that markets cannot operate in a vacuum; they require a legal and regulatory framework that only governments can provide; and at many other tasks, markets sometimes prove inadequate or fail altogether: that is why governments must, for example, invest in infrastructure and provide essential services to the poor; it is not a question of state or market: each has a large and irreplaceable role. The 1991 World Development Report further states that the proper economic role of the government is larger than merely standing in for markets if they fail to work well; in defining and protecting property rights, providing effective legal, judicial and regulatory systems, improving the efficiency of the civil service, and protecting the environment, the State forms the very core of development.

Don't tell us fairy tales, employers, when you state that privatization is therefore acknowledged by nearly everyone to be an essential condition for economic and therefore social progress.

Has the free market being performing so well of late? There have been massive business collapses, foolish if not dishonest speculative ventures have squandered the small savings of thousands of investors and high-profile investors, touted as modern-day heros, have ended up in prison for fraud and theft involving huge sums of money. Is that climate of flexibility and freedom you want all enterprises to benefit from?

We know from experience that unregulated markets are slaughterhouses where the strong chop up the weak.

I fully support in this respect what my colleague, Neil Kearney, has earlier said in this Conference, and we in Public Services International will keep on campaigning with the whole international trade union movement to see that working people are not kept down by fear, because fear is what union busters, violators of workers' rights, depend on. If you take away workers' rights, then you bring back fear: fear of violence, fear of getting the sack, fear of poverty. If you take away workers' rights, then you take away dignity and the individual's means of securing social justice for himself or herself and for society as a whole.

Democratic structures in society, including industrial democracy, with their stress on human rights and social justice are the necessary checks on the dog-eat-dog market. The 1993 Human Development Report reckons that people's participation is becoming the central issue of our time. States and people must have the opportunity to influence the global decisions that are going to influence them so profoundly. This means making the institutions of global governance much broader and more participatory. There should, in particular, be a searching re-examination of the Bretton Woods organizations. We agree that has greater urgency than the Employers' attempt to debilitate the role of the ILO. But fortunately here in the ILO we can raise our voice.

The employers no longer accept the criticism that they are slowing the ILO's progress. But that is exactly our experience in many sectoral meetings, where the henchmen of the IOE are obstructing the proceedings, where they try to water down the conclusions to meaningless generalities, where they seek to prevent the discussion of the real issues. Their attitude is particularly negative in public sector meetings, where they form only a small minority but try to dominate the Government group, and I must say that it is very often also the fault of governments for not sending the most appropriate people to represent them.

Public Services International agrees that the ILO has been heavily influenced by the conditions prevailing in what have traditionally been the major sectors. Perhaps the Employers have overlooked the 1991 OECD Employment Outlook which includes an inquiry about trends in trade union membership and the vast increase in the ratio of public sector unionists and workers in comparison to the private sector, including the number and range of public service occupations. Therefore, I reiterate our call for the creation of a special ILO branch to deal specifically with the public sector and a very significant increase in activities for the public sector.

It upsets me to read that the Employers regard the ILO as a sort of International Rotary Club, where international labour standards should be limited to generalities, because you can't trust governments anyway. They voted for something which they knew would never be applied in their countries, it says in their paper. What about the Employers' vote? Did they oppose all ILO instruments in the past? Could it be that their predecessors were somewhat more enlightened?

Can we really consider them as sincere and honest partners, when they say that the practice of making technical cooperation conditional on the application of standards has the effect of penalizing innocent populations for the abuses of their governments? The same people who want to stifle any debate on the structural adjustment programmes of the IMF and the World Bank because those conditionalities they like?

Public Services International is of the opinion that ILO standards should be part of structural adjustment programmes and that it is not the business of the World Bank to draw up labour codes for African countries.

We regret very much that there are some governments who make a mockery of the ILO by ignoring the very Conventions to which they are a signatory, for instance, the British Government, but we cannot but state that this Government does exactly what the Employers want.

All these double standards, the hypocrisy, the dogmatic approach make me wonder whether this is really the opinion of responsible business leaders around the world, who decide the fate of millions of workers. If so, we might have to reinvent socialism again.

Original Russian: The PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – Before concluding the sitting and adjourning it, I would like to give the floor to Mr. Joel, the Government delegate of Papua New Guinea, who would like to use his right of reply in connection with the statement made by Mr. Kutal, the Workers' representative of the same country.

Mr. JOEL (Government delegate, Papua New Guinea) – I would simply like to make one correction concerning a misrepresentation made by the Workers' representative from Papua New Guinea. He referred to the reduction in the indexation of wages and to changes of other conditions of employment in our country. He also referred to a reduction in the actual minimum wage itself. That particular decision was made by the Minimum Wages Board, which is tripartite and includes a representative of the workers. The Minimum Wages Board did not make a recommendation. It made a determination, which is final in our country. That is the misrepresentation that the Workers' representative made, and that I would like to correct.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS FOR 1994-95

General discussion

12. The Committee had before it the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 as submitted to the Governing Body at its 255th Session (February-March 1993). The Committee also had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and Other Financial Questions, containing a report on the consideration of the Director-General's original proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body; the Governing Body's discussion of this report was set out in an extract from the minutes of the 255th Session of the Governing Body which had been circulated in Document FC/D.2. In addition, the Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 4 which contained information concerning the fixing of the budget exchange rate for 1994-95.

13. In introducing the proposals, the Director-General asked for the patience of members of the Governing Body present in the room in listening to his fourth speech on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95, but noted that many delegates who were present were not members.

14. The Director-General recalled that the proposed budget was a zero-growth budget, and that, to take account of the difficult financial situation in which many countries found themselves, it was not possible to do otherwise. He expressed his appreciation to member States which intended to demonstrate their confidence in the Organization by maintaining the level of their contributions for 1994-95. It was also appropriate to bear in mind the changes which had taken place in the policy of the organizations which collaborate with the ILO. This was the case in particular of the United Nations Development Programme which was now emphasizing the national execution of technical cooperation projects by the beneficiaries themselves. The ILO supported this policy which implied a change in its own role, with more emphasis on assistance in the definition of policies and programmes, and less on the implementation of projects. This United Nations decision, with which the ILO had associated itself, had been taken by member States. It had been taken into account in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95.

15. The Director-General noted that account had to be taken of the increasing number of member States which were requesting ILO cooperation. Moreover, the nature of these requests was changing due to political changes in those countries which had chosen democracy and a market economy, and wished to introduce mechanisms to allow them to implement these choices, in particular in the economic and social domain.

16. The Director-General indicated three key features of the budget. In the first place, important savings were proposed in respect of certain programmes and administrative work in Geneva. These savings would be realized mainly by improving administrative procedures and the functioning of the Office. Secondly, the physical presence of the ILO in member States was to be increased substantially. Thirdly, the technical departments in Geneva would undertake work in order to respond to the new types of requests being made to the Office by constituents.

17. Some of the proposals for economies took account of decisions of the Governing Body. These included those concerning the modified procedures to be followed in ILO regional conferences to make them more efficient and less costly, which had already proved to be satisfactory. Changes were also to be introduced in the functioning of the General Conference so that it may be made more efficient, but also shorter. The Governing Body was also in the course of modifying its own methods of work.

18. The Director-General said that economies were to be realized in the administrative services at headquarters, on travel costs, on the costs of the ILO offices in industrialized countries, and in the publications and documents services. These economies would enable the development of the ILO's presence in the field, and more rapid assistance than in the past to member States, by providing them with analysis and advice to support the determination of appropriate policies. To this end, the "Active partnership" policy had been proposed to the Governing Body. This policy included the establishment of 14 multidisciplinary teams throughout the world.

19. The Director-General went on to explain the rationale behind the establishment of the multidisciplinary teams, in order to assist the preparation of social policies in a comprehensive way, since it was impossible to deal with the employment question (for example) without taking into account the question of training or that of labour administration. Moreover, in future the tripartite approach would be given more emphasis, in order to reflect the "Active partnership" policy in the implementation of the ILO programme of technical cooperation and in all work involving relations with ILO constituents. For this reason, each of the multidisciplinary teams would include an official responsible for employers' relations, and another responsible for workers' relations.

20. The Director-General emphasized the significant increases in resources for technical cooperation activities and for relations with employer and worker organizations, despite the zero growth regime, because of various savings achieved. He affirmed his belief that the advance towards democracy in member States implied the need for more cooperation between the Office and employers' and workers' organizations, and a stronger presence of the Office in the field.

21. The technical departments in Geneva would be less involved in the daily management of projects and technical cooperation programmes, work which would be taken over by the field offices. On the other hand the technical departments would be called on to develop their expertise in the various fields of the ILO's competence. The ILO had to improve the intellectual quality of its services to member States.

22. Noting that in 1994 the International Labour Conference would be called upon to reflect on the future of the Organization, the Director-General pointed out that the two main challenges facing the Organization in that year would be the celebration of its 75th anniversary and its participation in the United Nations World Social Summit. The first of these would require the Organization to demonstrate its relevance to the major member States at the end of this century and the beginning of the next. He also recalled that the Governing Body had asked the Office to play a prominent part in the preparation for the Summit in relation to the problems of poverty, employment and social cohesion. He believed that if the Employers' and Workers' organizations were to be involved in activities that concerned them at the Social Summit, the Organization would have to prove that it had the resources, the competence and the expertise to play its proper role in the United Nations system.

23. The Director-General then offered some general comments on the three main themes of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-1995. The first of these concerned the contribution of the Office to the process of democratization now taking place in many member States. In making this contribution the Office would have to ask itself how it could assist these States to meet the challenges they themselves had chosen to confront. They would have to be helped in setting up the institutional frameworks, the administrations and the employer and worker organizations they needed to facilitate social dialogue.

24. The second major theme concerned the struggle against poverty and the search for solutions to the problems of unemployment. The Director-General recalled that the promotion of employment had been the only matter which had caused difficulty during discussions in the Governing Body, because the Employers' group considered that the Office had not given it sufficient priority. Employment issues were a major problem, which most member States had to face, but the Office could not substitute itself for them in resolving their problems. The role of the Office was to help member States to develop the institutional capacities to determine their employment policies for themselves; thus the work of the Office would have to complement that of its constituents.

25. The third major theme was that of workers' protection, a traditional activity of the Office. The Director-General observed that the events which had taken place in recent years in many member States showed that it was not possible to reduce the work of the Office in this field.

26. The Director-General concluded by expressing his appreciation of the quality of discussion on the Programme and Budget proposals in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee as well as in the Governing Body. He observed that the proposals now submitted to the Committee had been approved by a solid consensus in the discussions in the Governing Body.

27. Mr. Vargas Campos, Chairman of the Governing Body, observed that the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 showed an increase in nominal terms when compared with the previous biennium, but in fact showed zero growth in real terms. The themes and objectives set out in the proposals were in line with the ILO's mandate and showed how it intended to give a more effective and prompt response to requests from member States. The active partnership policy and the creation of multidisciplinary teams were the main instruments for bringing the Office closer to its constituents and should make a substantial contribution to the solution of labour problems in member States.

28. A number of administrative changes had also been proposed concerning the working methods of the Conference, the Governing Body, regional conferences and the Office itself. These proposals showed the determination of the Organization as a whole to give the most effective response to the needs of its member States. The proposals before the Committee were the result of exhaustive discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and in the Governing Body, and he expressed his appreciation to the members of both. He also expressed appreciation to the Office for the documents now before the Committee, and he urged that the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 be recommended for adoption by the Conference.

29. Miss Mackie, speaking in her capacity as Employers' spokesperson in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body, said that the Employers, however critical their views on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95, shared a wholly constructive and positive attitude to the work of the ILO. If they did not believe in and have faith in it, they would not take the trouble to criticize it, nor to offer their own proposals, as they had done and would continue to do. The Employers were very conscious that the document was a programme as well as a budget, and the discussion on the programme and budget proposals was therefore the main occasion on which the constituents of the ILO Governing Body, and then the Conference, could discuss in broad terms what the ILO was doing and what its priorities were.

30. The documents containing the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 were indeed quite awe-inspiring and obviously took much time to prepare. The present procedure might well be the best way of doing things, but the Employers found it rather unsatisfactory. It took up a great deal of time and did not provide adequate opportunity for discussion of many important policy questions. It simply could not be right that important departments and sections of the ILO's work should receive no more than perhaps half-an-hour's discussion, once every two years, during a long and complex debate. The Employers hoped that once the proposed improvements to the work of the Conference and Governing Body were in place it would be possible to examine in more detail the working methods of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee.

31. The Employers had worked very hard to give detailed consideration to all the proposals in the draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95, as they had done in February 1992 to a preliminary discussion paper presented by the Director-General. They were disappointed to find that the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 did not appear to reflect adequately their comments on that preliminary document. They had clearly stated that their support would depend on the Office's response to their proposals and in particular on the priority to be given to programmes designed to create and develop employment. Replying to the earlier comments of the Director-General, she said that the Employers' view that employment promotion should be established as a first priority was not and would never be intended to mean that the ILO should abandon everything else, nor that it should interfere with the programmes created by the governments of member States.

32. The Employers had expressed support for a number of policy concepts, including active partnership and the creation of multidisciplinary teams, although they had expressed concern about the details of how the teams' work would be carried out. They had also discussed at great length all the major programmes included in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95, and their comments could be found in the documents now before the Committee. They strongly supported the efforts to find savings in the work of the Governing Body, the Conference itself, and the regional conferences, but they were concerned that not enough appeared to have been done to create a more flexible structure for the management and staff of the Office. It was gratifying to see that the Bureau for Employers' Activities continued to be recognized as an important part of the programme and that provision had been made to increase its budget by the same percentage as that for the Bureau for Workers' Activities.

33. Miss Mackie stressed that the Employers were strongly supportive of the work of the ILO, but it had to be more receptive to change, and to develop and refine its work while adhering to the principles for which it was established. Although in principle the Employers were able to support many of the proposals contained in the draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95, at the conclusion of the debate in the Governing Body they had abstained from supporting the adoption of the Programme and Budget for submission to the Conference. At the present time the Employer delegates at the Conference had not yet discussed decisions they might take when the plenary of the Conference held the vote on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95.

34. Mr. Vanni, the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that the proposals before the Committee were the end product of discussions which had begun more than a year ago, in early 1992, when the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body had held preliminary discussions on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95. The Workers gave their full support to the three major themes of the programme and budget proposals: the promotion of democracy, the fight against poverty, and workers' protection, the first two of which the ILO shared with other specialized agencies of the UN system.

35. Workers' protection, however, fell exclusively within the competence of the ILO, and the Organization should ensure that this activity stood out clearly in the ILO's programmes dealing with international labour standards and technical cooperation. The active partnership policy was a new and welcome feature of the ILO's activities and would give new impetus to the promotion of tripartism in the fight against poverty, and in efforts to improve productivity while safeguarding employment and working conditions. The Workers also strongly supported the introduction of multidisciplinary teams and the programme on interdepartmental projects, which together would give a considerable increase in resources for regional programmes.

36. The Workers were, however, disappointed to see yet again a zero real growth budget. The level of resources proposed was simply not enough for the ILO to fulfil its responsibilities under present-day social, political and economic conditions. Zero real growth meant that the Organization had no reserves to fall back on and it could easily find itself in a crisis again if a few member States were unable to pay their contributions. The Workers were well aware of the answers usually put forward in defence of zero real growth. They could only voice once again their extreme disappointment that the ILO's programmes were not expanding more rapidly, and they urged the governments to show stronger support for the ILO by paying their contributions on time and in full.

37. The Representative of Switzerland expressed appreciation for the work of the Office and the quality of the documents now before the Committee, which gave some indication of what the ILO would be doing in the twenty-first century. In the world today change was taking place rapidly; therefore the Organization, which was going to celebrate its 75th anniversary in 1994, should look at the need for reform. He agreed with the remarks of the Employer spokesperson in recognizing the merits of the major themes contained in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95; he expressed particular support for the principal of zero real growth, and to the emphasis on programmes concerned with the promotion of democracy and workers' rights. He recognized that a number of administrative reforms were being made which would yield budgetary savings. He agreed with the concerns expressed by the Employers on how some of the objectives were to be achieved. The proposals should take more account of the principles on which the Organization was based to face up to the new challenges of international competition. At a time when the pace of change was quickening, and the world liberalizing itself, negotiations were taking place in other international organizations on the liberalization of world trade - but the ILO was not equipped to deal with the social consequences of this process. Member States should be aware that the ILO needed the means to respond to the challenges associated with the liberalization of world trade to establish a social platform which might take the form of a "social GATT".

38. If the search for savings was to be worthwhile the Organization should avoid superficial reforms which achieved little in real terms but were time consuming to discuss and put in place. Included in the reforms should be a review of the staff structure to introduce more flexibility and perhaps even suppress some posts. This was not an exercise only for the Office or the Director-General: the governments should also be involved so as to give their support to the Director-General and his staff in such a difficult task.

39. The creation of multidisciplinary teams was a good idea if one wished to bring technical cooperation activities closer to the constituents of the Organization. He understood that the objective of technical cooperation activities was to permit, through the constituents, the implementation of international labour standards. It was not clear, however, how effective the work of multidisciplinary teams would be because there were no political guarantees to exclude political conditionality from technical cooperation activities and thus allow these activities and international labour standards to be progressively introduced. Some form of political guarantees should therefore be given to ensure that the work of these teams would produce concrete results without any form of political conditionality.

40. There were also legitimate concerns expressed by the Employers about proposed interdepartmental programmes. The idea was sound but perhaps savings could be made and staff better motivated if the administrative burden on these programmes could be lightened. The governments of member States, especially his own, were scrutinizing more and more closely the use made of contributions paid to international organizations and the benefits derived from them - they were no longer prepared to hand out blank cheques. His attitude to the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 would be determined by the responses to these questions.

41. The representative of Namibia supported the general thrust of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 and was pleased to see administrative savings being used to finance more activities in the field. It was understandable that many states had called for a zero real growth regime once more but this should not be a reason to cut activities in regions affected by economic stagnation or decay. Indeed, the ILO should expand its programmes in areas such as the occupied Arab territories and the countries of southern Africa so as to help the oppressed people in these regions. The ILO should also give greater support to activities concerned with equality for women so as to improve their social and economic status. Taken as a whole the draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95 was a reasonably well-balanced package and he would support its adoption by the Conference.

42. The representative of Australia had already gone on record to compliment the ILO on the innovations contained in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95. In recent years, the ILO had shown itself to be a well administered agency with a good record of budgetary constraint. The proposals once again complied with the concept of zero real growth and he would support the recommendation for the Conference to adopt the Programme and Budget for 1994-95. At the same time, a proper ordering of priorities was absolutely essential for a zero real growth budget, particularly where there were so many laudable but competing objectives.

43. Although for an organization like the ILO the staff was its most valuable resource, it appeared to be extravagant to pay 70 per cent of the total budget in staff costs. As a minimum, the Office should carry out a detailed assessment of staff needs in consultation with the Staff Association, taking into account the Organization's need for well-qualified professional staff. At present there appeared to be an imbalance in the staffing structure, with Professionals making up only about one-third of the total. The salary scales also should be brought into line with the UN common system, with the gradual phasing out of extra salary steps. He shared the views of the Employers and the Workers that employment promotion should be considered the top priority for the Organization. Unemployment and poverty were huge problems, even in developed countries: as well as leading to loss of self respect for the individual, they constituted a danger to democracy and the ILO had to give a higher priority to activities aimed at eradicating them. The interaction between labour standards and operational activities should also continue to be given a high priority and it was heartening to see the Director-General's specific commitment concerning labour standards. As a concluding comment, he strongly opposed the notion of assessing any shortfall from the present biennium on member States in 1994-95. The Director-General should commit himself to meeting shortfalls from savings, preferably without reducing programme activities.

44. The representative of the Islamic Republic of Iran recalled that goals such as the establishment of a democratic society and the elimination of poverty depended initially on a fundamental commitment to a programme of human resource development and the creation of employment. These basic objectives were closely interdependent and it was important to recognize this link in order to ensure that government policies and programmes were effectively designed and implemented. He welcomed the new measures introduced to expand the ILO's programme of technical cooperation in the field and the efforts made to generate savings to help meet these goals. It was important however to maintain the structure of core programmes and priorities of the Organization, and if additional savings were required the Office could perhaps consider streamlining more of its administrative procedures.

45. The resources allocated to the Asia and Pacific region for 1994-95 seemed meagre compared to the allocations for the other regions. After all, the majority of the world's needy lived in this region where many of the new central Asian member States of the Organization were to be found, so surely it deserved more resources. He welcomed the proposals for the restructuring of the Organization and emphasized the need to ensure that its scarce resources were allocated so that high-priority activities could be carried out most efficiently.

46. The representative of Yemen said that the delay in payment of his Government's 1993 contribution to the Organization was a result of the significant restructuring required following the reunification of the separate Yemen States in 1992. Indeed, some constitutional modifications had only just been finalized and these internal concerns had received priority. Yemen had traditionally met its obligations on time and it would do so in the future.

47. The representative of Hungary expressed his appreciation for the programme and budget proposals and agreed that the three priority themes concerning the establishment of democracy, the elimination of poverty and the protection of workers' rights were important and fundamental priorities for the Organization. It had shown a willingness to adapt to the far reaching economic and structural changes currently occurring worldwide and the integrated active partnership approach proposed by the Director-General was a welcome innovation. Closer cooperation between member States and the ILO should follow from the establishment of the multidisciplinary teams and he was pleased that Budapest had been selected as the location for the Central and Eastern European team.

48. His country, and indeed the entire Central and Eastern European region, faced formidable challenges in the transition phase to market-driven economies. New structures, new institutions and even new thinking were needed. Close cooperation between governments and the Organization, through the MDTs, would be essential for the proper development of the region and he strongly supported the adoption of the programme and budget proposals.

49. The representative of Mexico endorsed the proposals and reminded the Committee that the creation of employment, especially for migrant and minority groups, and the establishment of social justice were core elements of the ILO's original mandate. The Organization nevertheless needed to recognize the growing worldwide importance of environmental issues and the Office should coordinate programmes with other United Nations agencies in order to develop global strategies that took account of environmental concerns.

50. The representative of China expressed his appreciation for the efforts of the ILO in diverting resources from administrative to substantive programmes, thus keeping budgetary increases to a reasonable level. The elimination of poverty should be regarded as the top priority for the Organization and more resources should be provided for programmes related to this activity and to employment creation. The adjustments already proposed by the Governing Body were most welcome. Although the "active partnership policy" was a welcome initiative, the activities of the multidisciplinary teams should be controlled by guidelines set out by the Governing Body and the Conference. He also raised a number of questions concerning the increase in resources for travel and for the purchase of equipment. These were answered separately and in detail by members of the Office staff.

51. The representative of the United States supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95, which contained three priority themes entirely compatible with the mandate of the Organization. Zero real growth was now a more important issue than ever and he endorsed the reforms implemented by the Director-General which would help the ILO continue to carry out its work in today's difficult economic climate. It was important to reduce headquarters expenditure where possible so as to expand field activities and for this reason he was pleased to support the active partnership programme and the establishment of the multidisciplinary teams. He endorsed the comments made by the representative of Australia that any shortfall in income in 1992-93 should be met by savings rather than carried forward and assessed on member States in 1994-95. The Director-General should continue to monitor this situation closely.

52. The representative of Bangladesh fully supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 which reflected a balanced programme within the limitations imposed by a zero real growth budget. The three priority areas represented areas of critical importance to developing countries, although a closer collaboration between international agencies such as the World Bank and the ILO might generate a more globally coordinated response to the problems faced by individual member States.

Item-by-item discussion

53. After completing its general discussion on the draft Programme and Budget proposals, the Committee proceeded to an item-by-item discussion of each major programme in accordance with normal procedure.

Item 10: International Labour Conference

54. The representative of China, referring to paragraph 10.6 of the Programme and Budget proposals, queried the need for the renting of the UN Conference facilities in Geneva when the ILO had its own self-contained facilities. He wondered also about the need for external printing when the ILO possessed its own internal printing capacity.

55. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that two conference rooms at the ILO building were in fact used for Committee meetings during the Conference in an effort to make savings. However, almost 2,000 delegates attended the Conference each year and it was physically impossible to accommodate this number of persons in the ILO building, so the Office was obliged to rent the UN facilities. The ILO printing facilities were geared for year-round operations and it was only the excess during the Conference that was placed with outside contractors.

Items 20 to 240

56. No discussion.

Item 250: Field programmes in Africa

57. The representative of Mozambique supported the draft proposals in general and emphasized the importance of the programmes concerning the promotion of employment, vocational training, self-employment and the struggle against poverty. He stressed the many problems now being faced in countries in Africa and in particular southern Africa, where transition to market-oriented economic systems would imply the need for continuing ILO assistance. These matters were of prime importance to the region as a whole and it was gratifying to see that the proposals would ensure that ILO services were maintained, provided that resources were not subject to any form of reduction in the course of programme implementation.

Item 260

58. No discussion.

Item 265: Field programmes in Arab States

59. The representative of Kuwait regretted that more resources were not available for technical cooperation under this programme. The Arab world also had been undergoing considerable political and economic change, and the ILO should provide resources for the kind of assistance given to other regions going through the same transformation. The Regional Office should move back to Beirut as soon as possible and there was a good case for the Multidisciplinary Team Office to be established in Kuwait. Establishing a physical presence in the field was of prime importance if the real need for technical cooperation in the region was to be met. At present the region was receiving only distant advice on technical cooperation and other activities and basing the Regional Office in Geneva was not cost-effective.

60. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) indicated that this major programme had in fact the benefit of a programme increase of 5.61 per cent in addition to the increase of a further 8 per cent to cover cost increases. He fully recognized that the resources made available to this programme were not sufficient to meet all potential needs, but this was equally true for all other regional programmes. Notwithstanding the constraints of zero real growth, the Director-General had proposed programme increases for each regional programme; this had not been any easy task. The Director-General was very sensitive to the needs of the region and had recently completed a trip to all Gulf States in order to obtain a first-hand impression of their requirements. The Kuwait office was in the process of being reopened and a member of the multidisciplinary team for the region was assigned to this office. Moreover, an ILO team had recently visited Beirut with a view to reopening the regional office. As the premises that had been rented by the ILO in Beirut were severely damaged, negotiations were currently in progress to secure suitable alternative premises in Beirut. The process of reassigning staff from Geneva to Beirut was imminent and it was expected that the regional office would be fully operational in Beirut towards the beginning of 1994.

61. No discussion.

Item 280: Field programmes in Europe

62. The representative of Finland was disappointed that there was no expert on working conditions and environment included in the Central and East European Multidisciplinary Advisory Team. His country was particularly concerned about these matters and hoped that this expertise would be available.

63. A representative of the Director-General (The Director of Programming and Management) confirmed that there was no provision for a specialist on working conditions and environment but emphasized that the Team would work closely with the relevant headquarters' department responsible for these activities. Officials would be sent to advise constituents as required. Resources for this work were not necessarily reflected under the Team's resources but rather under the major programmes' allocation for advisory services.

Items 290 to 296

64. No discussion.

Statement on procedure

65. The Chairman said that the Finance Committee had now completed both the general discussion and the item by item discussion on the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95. The plenary of the Conference had also held a preliminary discussion on this subject which included statements from the Employers, the Workers, and a representative of the Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran, and in the absence of any further comments the Committee was now in a position to approve the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95.

66. In accordance with normal practice, the Chairman proposed that the Committee adjourn to enable the Office to carry out the formal execution of the forward purchase contracts, and reconvene to approve the final resolution for the Conference when the exact exchange rate and budget totals were known.

67. The Committee agreed to this procedure and the meeting adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Provisional Record

80th Session, Geneva, 1993

SECOND ITEM ON THE AGENDA: PROGRAMME AND BUDGET PROPOSALS AND OTHER FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

THIRD REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 11 June 1993 with Mr. Y. Chotard (France) as Chairman and Reporter, and Dr. Shah M. Farid (Bangladesh) as Vice-Chairman.

ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF NEW MEMBER STATES

2. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft programme and budget for 1994-95 and other financial questions, and document FC/D.4, containing resolutions submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessments of contributions of new member States.

3. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) described to the Committee in detail the draft resolutions proposed in respect of the rates of assessment for a number of member States which had recently joined the Organization.

4. The representative of the Republic of Moldova wished to refer to the level of contribution payable by his country to the programme and budget of the International Labour Organisation for the 1992-93 biennium, an extremely important matter in the relationship between his country and the Organization. He hoped that the Conference would be able to give a sympathetic consideration to the particular circumstances his country faced at present. The rates of assessment for new member States in the ILO had been examined at the 255th Session of the Governing Body earlier in 1993, when the Allocations Committee had presented a report recommending to the Governing Body the same rates of assessment for member States as those established by the United Nations, following the practice of harmonizing the scales of assessment between the ILO and the United Nations.

5. At the same session of the Governing Body, the Allocations Committee had proposed that the contributions of new member States of the ILO which had formed part of the ex-USSR would be deducted from the contributions of the ex-USSR for the previous years. In this way, the rate of assessment for the Republic of Moldova to the budget of the ILO had been fixed at 0.15 per cent. The Republic of Moldova, a Member of the ILO since 8 June 1992, had to contribute to the budget according to the rates of assessment decided by the Allocations Committee, 266,733 Swiss francs for 1992, and 471,614 Swiss francs for 1993. These contributions were fixed according to a methodology applied by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which took account of several measures of economic potential, the main one of which was gross national product (GNP) per capita. Under this calculation, the figure estimated by IMF was US$2,920 per person. Without wishing to question the objectivity of the methodology applied, he thought that this figure was too high and did not correspond to reality because the statistical information supplied to the IMF did not correspond to the standards applied elsewhere. Indeed, this was the conclusion reached in a discussion between the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare and the UNDP Resident Representative in Moldova in April 1993.

6. The World Bank had recently recalculated the GNP per capita on the basis of new statistical information to be $1,590 per person, but even this figure was regarded as too high by World Bank experts and a new calculation was required. Early in July 1993 an IMF mission would arrive in Moldova to investigate, among other things, the structure of national statistics with a view to bringing them into line with international standards, after which a new calculation of GNP per capita would be made.

7. The Republic of Moldova was facing extreme financial difficulties and had been forced to cut back on social programmes, and at present salaries, pensions and other social benefits were not being paid according to law. In view of this, and also the fact that the IMF and World Bank had not yet made a final calculation for GNP per capita, which in turn was the base upon which rates of assessment for ILO contributions were calculated, he appealed to the Conference to suspend for one or two years the payment of Moldova's budgetary contributions to the ILO. This would provide the funds for urgent social programmes to assist the poor in his country.

8. The Treasurer replied that the Director-General was well aware of the dissatisfaction expressed by a number of member States on recommendations recently put forward by the UN Committee on Contributions to the General Assembly. It was partly for this reason that the scale now being proposed to the Committee related to 1994 only, so that if the General Assembly were to revise its scale later in 1993 the revision could be taken into account when the 1994 International Labour Conference considered a scale of assessments for 1995. For many years now the ILO scale of assessments had been based on that of the UN, adjusted to take account of differences in membership, and the ILO, in common with other UN specialized agencies which followed the same practice, was not in a position to adopt an independent scale. It was unlikely that the Conference would agree to any proposal to suspend the payment of contributions, because the corresponding shortfall would have to be redistributed among the other member States in order to match the income budget with the expenditure budget.

9. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the resolutions concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States, the texts of which appear at the end of this report.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1994

10. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 4, containing a draft scale of assessment of member States' contributions for 1994 as recommended by the Allocations Committee of the Governing Body and endorsed by the Governing Body itself. The Committee also had before it document FC/D.4, which was a report of the Allocations Committee submitted direct to the Finance Committee under the authority of the Governing Body. This report explained that two new Member States, Bosnia and Herzegovina and also Kazakhstan had become members of the ILO after consideration of the draft 1994 scale of assessments by the Governing Body. Their rates of assessment for 1994 had already been approved in the United Nations, and accordingly, a revised ILO draft scale of assessments, incorporating those two new member States, was recommended to this Committee for submission to the Conference. The report also covered the possibility of additional States which already had rates of assessment established in the UN becoming members of the ILO during the current Session of the Conference, and proposed that the draft 1994 scale be further revised to include such new member States at rates based on their UN rates for 1994, and then submitted to the Conference for adoption.

11. The representative of Ukraine pointed out that the Ukrainian delegation had analysed thoroughly the draft contribution scale for 1994 and he drew the attention of the Committee to the rate of assessment fixed for his country in the draft scale. According to the document, Ukraine's contribution to the ILO was set at 1.88 per cent, an increase of more than 0.7 per cent since 1993. No other country had seen its contribution increased so sharply.

12. Referring to the decision of the 47th Session of the UN General Assembly, concerning the budget of the United Nations Organization, which had determined the contribution scale mentioned above, he pointed out that Ukraine's delegation to the session had found this decision unacceptable and had voted against the new scale of contributions. From its point of view, the new amount of Ukraine's contribution had not been established in line with certain basic principles and criteria. This had been confirmed by the UN Legal Adviser who pointed out that the Committee on Contributions, which had made recommendations to the General Assembly, had no mandate to modify Ukraine's contribution, and the decision as a whole was contrary to the rules of procedure in the UN.

13. This change to the rate of assessment for Ukraine's contribution was difficult to understand because the decision was taken at a time when Ukraine was experiencing extreme social and economic difficulties. Statistics reflected a sharp drop in living standards: in 1992, national income dropped by 14 per cent and the budget deficit rose to more than 9 per cent of GNP, while inflation sky-rocketed to over 2,000 per cent and new investment almost dried up. The billions spent to repair damage caused by Tchernobyl appeared to have been overlooked. This accident had affected millions of workers and Ukraine still needed help from the international community.

14. In view of the foregoing, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Ukraine informed the UN Secretary-General earlier this year that his Government would pay contributions to the UN regular budget on the basis of its financial obligations determined in the UN scale of contributions for 1992, 1993 and 1994, as approved by the General Assembly Resolution 46/221. Consequently, Ukraine could not agree with the proposed ILO draft scale of contributions.

15. Ukraine had always acted very responsibly in respect of its financial obligations to the ILO, and recently had paid a part of its 1992 arrears, despite its extreme economic difficulties. However, if the decision on page 3 of the English text of document FC/D.4 was put to the Committee, Ukraine would vote against it.

16. The Treasurer reiterated that the scale of assessments in the ILO was based on that of the UN, adjusted for differences in membership. It was true that Belarus and Ukraine had issued a statement earlier in the year at the United Nations objecting to the increases in their respective assessments and to the fact that they had been treated as new member States. Nevertheless, this was a matter which would have to be resolved in the United Nations and the ILO had no alternative but to follow its usual practice of basing its scale of assessment on that of the UN, with adjustments for differences in membership.

17. The representative of Turkey was pleased to announce that by a payment of 200,000 Swiss francs on 26 May 1993, his country's contributions due for 1993 had now been settled in full.

18. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the resolution concerning the draft scale of assessment of contributions for 1994 recommended by the Allocations Committee, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

RESOLUTION FOR THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1994-95 AND THE ALLOCATION OF THE BUDGET OF INCOME AMONG MEMBER STATES

19. The Committee had before it document FC/D.4, which contained details of the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95 and a draft resolution for submission to the Conference.

20. The Treasurer and Financial Comptroller recalled that at its previous sitting the Committee had authorized the Office to carry out the forward exchange contracts for the Organization's US dollar requirements for the 1994-95 biennium. These contracts had now been formally executed at a rate of 1.45 Swiss francs to the US dollar. The appropriate figures now to be inserted in the resolution were:

Budget of expenditure	$ 466,510,000
Budget of income	$ 466,510,000
Budget rate of exchange	1.45 Swiss francs to the dollar
Equivalent budget total in Swiss francs	SF 676,439,500

21. The Treasurer stated that as a result of the forward purchase contracts carried out, there would be a premium payable of approximately SF1.4 million which would be charged to the Income Adjustment Account in accordance with the Financial Regulations.

22. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the resolution for the programme and budget for 1994-95, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

ADOPTION OF REPORT

23. The Committee also agreed to authorize the Chairman and Reporter to adopt on its behalf the Third Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, so as to expedite its consideration by the Plenary of the Conference.

24. A table showing rates of assessment in the UN and the ILO for members of the former USSR and members of the former Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia is appended to this report (Appendix II). This appendix also shows the contributions payable for these member States in 1991, 1992 and 1993.

Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid

1. The Committee was established in accordance with paragraph 4 of the updated Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa which was adopted by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988). It was established, inter alia, for the purpose of monitoring action against apartheid.

2. The Committee was composed of 48 members with the right to vote (18 Government members, ten Employers' members and 20 Workers' members). It also included one deputy Government member, seven Employers' deputy members and 13 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting for the three groups was assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. A number of organizations with consultative status, as well as the African National Congress of South Africa (ANC) and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC), were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting, the Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. A. Ejalu (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda).

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. B. G. Hernandez (Employers' member, Philippines) and Mrs. S. Carr (Workers' member, Canada).

Reporter: Mr. R. Veltheim (Government member, Finland).

4. The Committee held six sittings. Its agenda was to examine the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which dealt, inter alia, with developments regarding the situation in South Africa in respect of labour and social matters, and contained an analysis of the information provided by governments and employers' and workers' organizations on measures taken against apartheid as foreseen in paragraph 5(b) of the Declaration as well as on international action against apartheid, and that which had been provided in response to the questionnaire revised by the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid which had been approved by the Governing Body of the ILO and distributed by the Office. A further document complemented the Special Report by providing a brief summary of the principal events concerning labour matters which have occurred in South Africa since the preparation of the 1993 Special Report. The Committee also had before it the following documents relating to the Committee on Discrimination of the 256th (May-June 1993) Session of the Governing Body:

(1) information supplied by governments and by employers' and workers' organizations on action taken against apartheid (GB.256/CD/2/2);

(2) report of the tenth meeting of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid (GB.256/CD/3/1);

(3) those portions of the report of the Committee on Discrimination which relate to the above matters (GB.256/12/23).

5. The representative of the Secretary-General (Mr. F. Abdel-Rahman, Assistant Director-General) drew attention to the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid, and reports of the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination. He commented that despite the changes that have taken place apartheid and its consequences in the field of labour are still very much a feature of South African society. Apartheid institutions like Bantustans and the tri-cameral parliament which excludes blacks are still in place and the socio-economic legacy of apartheid still separates the races. Violence which has taken thousands of lives had continued to threaten the fabric of society. Yet, despite these circumstances and the assassination of ANC leader Chris Hani by right-wing extremists as well as the recent raids on the offices of the PAC and NACTU which had resulted in the arrests and detentions of many people, multiparty talks on the constitutional future of the country continue. While it was not certain when these talks would achieve tangible results the expectations were that at the end of the month the multi-party conference would agree on the formation of a transitional executive council which would begin a process that could lead up to free and democratic elections in 1994. Such a development would go a long way to fulfilling the conditions laid down by the UN General Assembly and the Organization of African Unity as the basis for a substantive change of approach on the part of the international community as regards the activities to be undertaken in, and in relation to, South Africa. The Committee might wish to prepare for this eventuality by considering the kinds of action that may then be open to the ILO in relation to what is provided for in the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and the conclusions of the Harare tripartite conference of May 1992 which the Committee had adopted in June last year. The Committee's conclusions would, of course, be reached on the basis of suggestions made by the representatives of South African organizations attending this Conference (including the liberation movement and the unions) as well as government, employer and worker delegates in suggesting the most suitable ways in which the activities already undertaken can be used in the future as the basis for adopting and expanding the ILO contribution to the creation of a democratic, just and stable South Africa.

6. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson said that the meeting of the Committee could prove to be an extraordinary meeting. She welcomed the resumption of the political negotiations in South Africa which are expected to produce an agreement for the setting up of a Transitional Executive Council (TEC) by the end of the month. She, however, warned against too much optimism as there could be pitfalls which, as last year, had dashed the hope of success when the talks at the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (CODESA) broke down. Twenty-six organizations are taking part in the negotiations including the PAC and the Conservative Party, and because there are so many, reaching a speedy agreement might be difficult. It is feared that the Concerned South Africans Group (COSAG) might undermine the process by using delaying tactics or even pulling out of the negotiations. The ANC and its allies have demanded that the date for elections be fixed so that negotiations do not become a never-ending process. The turmoil which followed Chris Hani's assassination has made the South African Government realize it can no longer maintain law and order without the cooperation of the ANC. The proposal to hold elections on 27 April 1994 is a positive development. The Workers are deeply concerned by the violence that has engulfed the country and which threatens the stability of the country. Forces opposed to change have demonstrated their capacity to disrupt the negotiation process. The Boipatong massacre in June 1992 and that at Bisho, Ciskei, in September 1992 as well as the assassination of Chris Hani all point to the attempts of far-right organizations in collaboration with the security forces to fan the flames of a race war in South Africa. At the flat of Janus Waluz, Hani's alleged killer, a hit list of people to be killed was found which included the names of Nelson Mandela and Joe Slovo, Chairman of the South African Communist Party (SACP). A top level ICFTU fact-finding mission which visited South Africa in February 1993 concluded that the South African Government directly or indirectly was involved in the violence. The Workers regretted that the Special Report of the Director-General had not adequately assessed the impact of violence in South Africa. The number of workers who have been killed and wounded had risen to an alarming level. The leaders of COSATU and NACTU lived precariously and their lives were constantly threatened by elements within the security forces. The Workers' group welcomed the deployment of UN, OAU, EC and Commonwealth observers monitoring the violence and cooperating with the Goldstone Commission. Political developments had not brought much change in the social and labour field; employers continued to collude with the security forces to repress strikes; police had used dogs and fired teargas on striking workers; union members have been arrested; striking workers have been dismissed from their jobs. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson underlined the observation of the Group of Independent Experts (GIE) that certain apartheid laws still remained on the statute books like the Electoral Act of 1979, the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act and other laws in the field of education and social services. The situation in regard to extending labour legislation to all workers in South Africa remained unsatisfactory and the proposals made so far, in particular concerning farm workers and the public workers contained substantial restrictions on trade union rights. The Workers' group urged the ILO to continue to support the democratic trade unions in their struggle to extend basic trade union rights to all workers in South Africa, and particularly to those in the Bantustans. The Workers' group shared the concern expressed by the GIE that there had been a decline in economic assistance provided to the liberation movements and independent trade unions struggling to eradicate apartheid. They urged Governments not to stop the assistance now. The optimism that a free, non-racial democratic state is to be achieved soon in South Africa was mixed with fear for the future because of the potential danger posed by the right wing and the security forces to derail the present negotiations, and drag the country into a race war. The international community should not relax its vigilance and should maintain appropriate pressure against South Africa until the negotiating process toward the drawing and adopting of a new constitution and the holding of elections for a democratic and non-racial South Africa was irreversible. The Workers regretted that activities against apartheid, as noted in the GIE's report on the declining number of government replies in 1993, were diminishing at a critical period and before a satisfactory settlement had been reached. They deplored that the European Community, with the exception of one country, continued to report jointly. They believed that it was still premature to repeal the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. They only envisaged the possibility of recommending a suspension of the Declaration on condition that the multi-party negotiations agreed on a date for elections for a constituent assembly; the establishment of a transitional executive council; an independent electoral commission to oversee the election process and an independent media commission to ensure equal access to the media. The Declaration should be reimposed if something went wrong or if the present negotiations were derailed.

7. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed the hope that because of changes taking place in South Africa the Committee would soon be irrelevant. He welcomed the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa which took due note of the significant progress during the previous year of the transition from apartheid to democracy in South Africa. While the Employers expressed concern about violence and other problems that could interrupt the political negotiations they were, nevertheless, encouraged by the progress being made towards the creation of a non-racist society. The perpetrators of violence were a small minority that would soon be overwhelmed by the feeling amongst the major players who have laid the basis of an agreement; and any delays or deviations in the negotiations would not fundamentally alter the democratic course that the major players had set. The Employers shared the optimism expressed in the Special Report and believed that there was a continuing expansion of the democratic horizon in South Africa. All freedom-loving peoples all over the world expected that inevitably a politically stable democratic government that recognizes equality and justice and human rights regardless of race, colour, religion, creed and belief would be established in South Africa. Practically all the apartheid laws had been repealed. Laws on labour and social policy were being rewritten on the basis of the 1992 ILO Report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa. A new National Manpower Commission with tripartite composition had been established; the National Economic Forum was functioning; all these were proof of the positive developments that have taken place in South Africa. The ILO should focus on the positive and constructive activities of the South African employers that the Director-General described as satisfactory in his Report. The membership of three of the largest employers' organizations in South Africa were both black and white. Their representatives were attending the Committee and hopefully would brief the Committee on their progress. The Employers welcomed the proposed date of 27 April 1994 to hold elections in South Africa. In view of the encouraging developments in South Africa the ILO should provide technical assistance and advice to the social partners on the following matters: employment creation, labour administration, co-ordination and stratification of labour market institutions, labour relations and collective bargaining, productivity, manpower training and human resource development. The Employers urged that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the Programme of Action annexed thereto had to be revised and might have to be declared suspended. This should be included on the agenda of the 1994 International Labour Conference.

8. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson in response to the statement by the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that it would be premature to declare the Declaration against apartheid obsolete. Apartheid laws were still on the statute books. She did not think that it was advisable for the representatives of South African employers' organizations to speak in the Committee until there had been consultations on the matter.

9. The observer of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC) noted that last year's conference had unanimously adopted conclusions in the hope that sufficient progress would be made in South Africa that would have nullified any further consideration of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid. The victims of apartheid had also entertained these hopes and some had even recommended that the Declaration as amended be reviewed. Because of the reality and our experience in South Africa the PAC had argued otherwise. PAC cautioned that until the conditions enunciated by the Harare Declaration and the UN Consensus Resolution had been met the international community should maintain appropriate pressure on South Africa. Chapter III of the Special Report confirms the PAC's cautious recommendation to maintain the status quo ante. Since the unbanning of the liberation movements and other organizations, the South African Government has not reciprocated the goodwill of the international community. In the meantime, the majority of South Africans have experienced a myriad of cases of suffering, pain, death, assassinations, murders and massacres — Boipatong, Bisho, Katlehong and countless others. The assassination of Chris Hani and the shooting of the PAC observer's brother formed part of the daily experiences of many blacks. Recently, using gestapo tactics, the South African Government raided PAC offices, smashed glass doors and took away party documents. Seventy-two PAC members were arrested and detained. These actions have been denounced by all the parties at the multi-party negotiations. The PAC supported the position of the Workers and agreed with the views expressed by the representative of the Secretary-General about their cautious analysis of the developments in South Africa. In the labour field, the Government ignored the needs of the workers. When underpaid teachers asked for a wage increase, the Government said that it had no money but when white farmers marched and threatened to go on strike unless their subsidies were increased the Government found the money. The Government has bought new planes for the airforce from Switzerland. The country's serious economic situation was worsened by the rampant government corruption. The PAC urged that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid should not be suspended now. It was necessary to support the multi-party negotiations now underway because any decisions that come out of them would be broad-based and would be supported by the majority of the South African people.

10. The General Secretary of the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU) outlined the political developments in South Africa which he said were signalling the end of apartheid. An election date had been set, although it had still to be discussed further at meetings on 15 and 25 June, and this signalled that South Africans would at last be able to transform the country into a democracy. However, the date, and any other agreement reached in the multi-party talks, would be meaningless if the various armed formations were not brought under international supervision and joint control established over the South African Defence Force, the police brought under the control of the communities in which they operate, and the marginalized youth trained and reintegrated into society. Referring to the threat posed by the extreme right wing, he said that the security forces were unlikely to side with right-wing groups in a race war. However, the political leadership and the international community had to do everything in their power to prevent such a growth in racism. On the labour front, he referred to reforms affecting farm and domestic workers. The Bill, which would extend the provisions of labour legislation to cover farmworkers, was very flawed in that it created a different adjudication system and a separate jurisprudence for farmworkers. In addition, the Bill empowered the Minister to promulgate labour codes for farmworkers in different areas, and the special labour courts proposed in the Bill would not have the power to reinstate dismissed workers, thus increasing the risk of victimization of union activists. The Bill also provided for agreements preventing strikes and lockouts which NACTU believed would interfere with collective bargaining. Turning to the proposed application of the Wage Act of 1957, he criticized the Bill for leaving the Minister too much discretion in determining guidelines to be used by the Wage Board in setting minimum wages for farmworkers. There were about 1.5 million farmworkers whose appalling conditions of work and life meant that they could not freely participate in the political transformation taking place without basic worker rights. The 800,000 domestic workers were also cut off from the trade union movement and the liberation movements. Regarding ILO technical assistance, he referred to a meeting between the South African trade union leadership and the Director-General of the ILO on 26 February 1993 in which they called for assistance to be rendered inside the country to the democratic trade union movement and to the non-racial employers' organization when it was established. They had also discussed the need to review and amend the ILO Declaration on Action against Apartheid so that it would be in concert with developments inside the country. They had requested technical assistance in reforming the labour legislation, the labour market institutions, and workers' education. In conclusion, he thanked the ILO for its support and urged it to remain seized of developments in South Africa.

11. The Assistant General Secretary of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) conveyed the greetings of his organization and of the African National Congress (ANC) to the Committee. He recalled that when the Committee was established, its main task was to isolate South Africa as a way of ensuring an end to apartheid. The Committee had adopted policies appropriate to that goal. Those policies had been updated and amended as the situation in South Africa changed under pressure from the liberation movements, trade unions, and the international community. The ILO and the UN General Assembly resolutions had urged the South African Government to negotiate with the legitimate representatives of the majority of South Africans, to release all political prisoners, and to unban the liberation movements. These targets had since been met, and the policies of the UN system and other organizations had to take account of the new realities in South Africa. He pointed out that the negotiation process had resumed and the key issues were the principles that should underpin the new constitution, the process by which the new constitution would be drafted and adopted, the fundamental rights to be respected during the transition, the violence, and transitional structures. COSATU's position remained that a constitution should be drafted by an elected body that enjoys the support of the majority of South Africans and has legitimacy; hence its demand for a constituent assembly. COSATU believed that it was necessary to agree on certain basic rights that would ensure the necessary climate for free political activity and the holding of a fair election. Repressive legislation still on the statute books would also have to be abolished. COSATU supported the creation of a Transitional Executive Council (TEC), comprised of all the parties at the present negotiations, and aimed at ensuring multi-party control of key areas such as finance, foreign affairs, the security forces and regional government. COSATU wanted to ensure a level playing field, but without in any way being co-opted into the present governmental dispensation. The multi-party talks had so far reached tentative agreement on an election date; that the constitution should be written by a democratically elected constituent assembly; that there should be a commission on regions to agree on boundaries for purposes of elections; that there should be a constitutional principle regarding regions; and on certain fundamental human rights in the transition period. In addition, progress had been made on developing a common strategy towards combating violence from whatever quarter. While COSATU did not want to exaggerate the progress, they cautioned against a position that ignored these realities. Since the last meeting of the Committee considerable progress had been achieved. At that stage the Government had not been willing to establish a National Economic Forum, to restructure the National Manpower Commission, to extend labour laws to cover public-sector, farm and domestic workers. Substantial progress had been made in meeting those demands. The National Economic Forum had been formed and was getting down to the task of creating employment and alleviating the socio-economic deprivations that underpinned the violence sweeping the country. Employers' organizations had participated fully in this process, in the restructuring of the National Manpower Commission, and in the National Peace Accord, where they played a central role. The involvement of COSATU and the trade union movement in general in broader socio-economic issues represented a new field of activity for them. They were negotiating on the provision of electricity, the restructuring of industry, the reform of the training system, the regulation of the labour market; the protection of workers in the public, agricultural and domestic service sectors; VAT, and budgetary and other aspects of fiscal policy. These initiatives placed enormous demands on their human and financial resources, and highlighted the need for them to acquire skills and to learn from the experience of other countries. Organizations like the ILO could do much to assist them in developing policy proposals and mounting projects to address priorities such as employment creation, a national public works scheme, vocational training and the reform of labour market institutions. The tripartite forums that had been created, such as the Economic Forum and the Manpower Commission, provided appropriate counterparts for cooperation on policy and projects. In this regard COSATU would support the provision of assistance to all the parties participating in those tripartite forums once a date had been set for the elections and the Transitional Executive Council had been established. Over the past months political leaders such as Chris Hani had been assassinated and COSATU wanted to ensure that this form of terrorism did not succeed in delaying the negotiations process. They were of the view that while all parties at the negotiations forum should aid the process of creating peace, the Government had to do more to ensure that the violence was brought to an end. The regime had been slow to act when the violence affected black people, and yet was quick to act when the lives of white people were lost. It had recently raided and arrested members of the PAC and allied organizations, including the General Secretary of NACTU, Comrade Cunningham Ngcukana. Such double standards did not inspire confidence in the security forces.

12. The Government member from Denmark pointed out that since the last meeting of the Committee there had been important developments in South Africa. Negotiations were proceeding towards the adoption of a TEC and eventually a democratically elected assembly to draft the constitution. The negotiating council had proposed 27 April 1994 as a date for the elections. The Danish Government had and would continue to encourage these positive developments. There had also been serious setbacks, however. Violence threatened the negotiating process, and his Government had explained to the parties concerned that violence was not an alternative to the negotiations. This had been repeated in recent visits to South Africa by the Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs acting as President of the European Commission, who had also emphasized the importance of economic, trade and development relations between the EC and South Africa once a TEC was in place. The ILO could and should be an active player in the process of change inside South Africa, inter alia, providing technical cooperation to the social partners and assisting the process of labour law reform already under way. It was the opinion of his Government that the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa was obsolete and no longer served its purpose.

13. The Workers' member from Tunisia noted that Mr. Nelson Mandela had visited Tunisia and received warm support. Workers, he said, wanted to create a civilized society free from violence and extremism. He called for trade union solidarity in the Mahgreb region and across Africa.

14. The Employers' member from Kenya congratulated the ILO on sending a Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission (FFCC) to South Africa, and noted that its conclusions had been accepted by the tripartite bodies in South Africa. This was testimony to the thoroughness of the work of the FFCC. The restructuring of the National Manpower Commission to make it more representative, the launch of the tripartite National Economic Forum, the establishment of a number of other fora, the publication of draft legislation to improve working conditions, dispute settlement procedures and wages, were all clear indications of change taking place. He drew the Committee's attention to a meeting held in Harare in February 1992, sponsored by the IOE, PEC and EMCOZ, and attended by SACCOLA, FABCOS and NAFCOC. The meeting facilitated the formation of a working party to establish a non-racial employers' body in South Africa. South African employers had since visited other countries to study the workings of their non-racial employers' organizations and an IOE advisory team visited South Africa in September/October 1992 to assist the working party to draft guidelines on a new constitution. As a result of these efforts, a non-racial delegation was present during the Committee's sitting on Friday. Given that an election date had now been set, he urged the ILO to give assistance to the working party, to encourage the formation of tripartite structures in South Africa, to assist in the process of labour law reform, and to grant fellowships to the representatives of employers' organizations, particularly those in the black community, to help build professional leadership.

15. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed optimism at the changes taking place in South Africa but cautioned against over-optimism. The situation in South Africa was still too uncertain for the international community to relax the pressures aimed at encouraging the process of negotiations for a unitary, non-racial, democratic South Africa. Massacres and violence had become a general trend in South Africa in the transition to democracy. The ILO should convey to the South African Government the fact that the patience of the people was limited and time was running out. In these circumstances his delegation opposed the relaxation of pressure on the South African Government, particularly the arms and oil embargoes and sanctions on investments. He paid tribute to COSATU and NACTU for their progressive role and responsible leadership in the South African struggle against apartheid. Workers' rights and aspirations would only be realized under a democratic government.

16. The Government member of Cuba pointed out that her Government considered apartheid not only as an incarnation of racism but also a dehumanizing perversion of the human spirit embodied in a political and legal system based on the exploitation of a black majority by a brutal minority. Despite the encouraging recent developments and the rapprochement between the Government and the democratic opposition, it was impossible to ignore the prevailing violence which was not the result of inter-ethnic struggles as it had been presented. Evidence reported by the press, in judicial hearings, and in the conclusions of fact-finding commissions, pointed to the involvement of the South African security forces in the violence, with the participation of various criminal groups. Government agents had collaborated in training, financing and arming terrorist groups. These elements were still destabilizing democratically established governments, such as the Angolan Government, at times when peace agreements had been reached. The activities of death squads and extreme right-wing groups had to be included in this context. These developments led her to presume that warlike elements in the governments had been imposing their views over those elements that favoured negotiations, raising doubts about the degree of control exercised by the de Klerk Government over the criminal actions favoured by the regime's security forces. It was an obligation of this Government to take measures that would guarantee the elimination of all the apartheid laws still in force. The lifting of sanctions by some countries had not helped the situation. She said that it was necessary to make changes in South Africa that would end the economic discrimination still prevailing, which undermined the political transformations taking place. In the face of such a complex situation, her Government reiterated its irrevocable position in favour of the complete eradication of apartheid, its condemnation of the bantustanization and fragmentation policies, and its refusal of the dirty war which government elements were still waging against neighbouring countries and their own people. She observed that to resolve this crisis it would be necessary to establish a government of national unity as soon as possible, and to elect a constituent assembly to draft a democratic non-racial constitution. Her Government urged the international community to exert pressure towards the adoption of the above-mentioned measures emphasizing those related to the activities of the South African security forces. Finally, she said that her Government wished to reaffirm the validity of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid as well as the importance of the work of the Committee.

17. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic pointed out that the Special Report was based on principles of justice and humanity which could contribute to the installation in South Africa of a society without racial prejudice. Apartheid was far from being abolished and violence was continuing. The effects of violence had been negative on the negotiations and in this way they were delaying the progress towards the building of a non-racial society. The speaker recalled the Boipatong massacre of 17 June 1992, which led the ANC to suspend negotiations, and the events of 7 September 1992 when the Ciskei security forces shot demonstrators and killed 29 people. The South African Government proved its hesitation and showed that it was not really willing to put an end to apartheid; in fact, according to the speaker, it sought to divide and rule and used delaying tactics to hinder negotiations. For more than 40 years and the laws brutally oppressed the black majority of the country, for the benefit of whites, and the majority was sustained in the struggle by Nelson Mandela. Investigations had shown that the South African Government was implicated in the acts of violence committed by the security forces who targeted anti-apartheid militants. He referred to several acts of violence against trade union leaders, in particular, and the assassination of Chris Hani. The speaker asked how long the blood was going to stain the negotiating process and he demanded that proceedings must be started against the authors of the violence. International actions must be intensified, like those recommended by the Group of Independent Experts, and more active support should be given, in particular to the Front Line States. The speaker supported the maintenance of United Nations sanctions as far as South Africa was concerned, in particular on petroleum products. To establish a just and peaceful society it was advisable to persevere along the way already begun and to increase the assistance to the South African workers as well as to the militants acting against apartheid. Syria had banned all forms of cooperation with the apartheid regime and would continue to do so until its abolition.

18. The Government member of China highlighted the information contained in the Special Report. He expressed a wish that sensitive decisions would come out of the discussions of the Committee that would contribute to bringing the end of the apartheid regime. As a result of the long struggle of the South African people, the Government had been forced to adopt certain positive measures that have led to multi-party negotiations. The Government of China welcomed this positive development and supported the different parties to the process who wanted to solve the situation by peaceful means. The speaker expressed the opinion that it would take a long time before apartheid disappeared; he warned of the danger presented by the acts of the racist forces which could undermine the negotiating process. He appealed for the support of the international community to ensure that the process of the liberation struggle against apartheid continued. He invited the Government to make decisions in order to reach a peaceful solution and to instal a regime in which all would have equal rights.

19. The Employers' member of Tanzania welcomed the Special Report of the Director-General and the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission. Both reports were comprehensive and provided an important framework in dealing with the South African labour question. He noted the new developments in South Africa, particularly the repeal of discriminatory and repressive legislation; bilateral and multilateral negotiations — CODESA I and CODESA II; the establishment of a non-racial employers' organization; and indications that a non-racial election would be held. However, the speaker expressed concern about the continuing political violence which was a potential threat to the current process of negotiations. He appealed to all the parties concerned to create a climate conducive to negotiations. The ILO should encourage the recent initiatives to establish a non-racial employers' organization. He called for the support of all actions against apartheid outlined in the Special Report.

20. The Employers' member of Ghana condemned the violence which was continuing in South Africa. He noted that members of the Workers' group tended to lump the employers in South Africa together with the Government. The speaker said that not all employers were bad. Some were very progressive and most anxious to have a fair deal with the blacks. He was delighted to learn of the recent contacts between the ANC and right-wing whites. As good businessmen, employers in South Africa wanted a stable government. Employers in South Africa were beginning to develop a non-racial outlook. The ILO should give assistance to the liberation movements as well as the employers. The problems raised by the representative of NACTU could only be resolved when a strong government was elected that could deal with them.

21. The Workers' member from the United States supported the comments made by the Netherlands Union Confederation (FNV) in the Special Report, expressing doubts about the usefulness of the reporting exercises. South Africa is at a critical juncture in its history. The announcement of a proposed date of 27 April 1994 for elections did not carry the weight of an accepted date by a majority body. It did not answer the fundamental question of the purpose of the election. The announcement failed to address the mechanisms of voting. Above all, the Committee could not presume a free and fair election. Still, the proposed date gave the Committee an opportunity to consider what it could do to promote the democratic process through voter-education and voter-mobilization. Sanctions-monitoring could become violence-monitoring. Apartheid would not end on 27 April 1994. The election of a non-racial government was the best hope of addressing the legacy of apartheid. The challenge was to define the Committee's willingness to support the democratic process. The Committee had the resources to promote and support voter-education and the clout to monitor an election to ensure that it was free and fair. The speaker commended the work of the Group of Independent Experts and hoped that it would be allowed to continue as long as its expertise was required by the Committee.

22. The Government member of Zimbabwe observed that the past two sessions of the Committee had been held in a constructive and positive spirit. Based on the Special Report of the Director-General and other documents and the speeches of the representatives of various political groups at the forefront of the struggle for a democratic South Africa, the speaker discerned a common thread, an acknowledgement of the significant progress achieved so far in the negotiations for a democratic dispensation. The announcement of a tentative date for multiracial elections for a constituent assembly had raised hopes. She agreed with the Director-General's Report which warned that there were still problems to be faced before apartheid's epitaph could be written. The repealing of apartheid could not be equated with the destruction of its structures. The speaker expressed concern about the unbridled violence and mayhem that had been unleashed on the innocent and defenceless population. Her Government did not support the suspension of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid.

23. The Government member of Namibia welcomed the Director-General's comprehensive and enlightening Special Report. He took note of the statements made by representatives of the liberation movements and the trade unions from South Africa. All practical, conceivable and realistic measures against apartheid should be taken to enhance the establishment of a non-racial and democratic government. He expressed concern that an increasing number of ILO member States were either contemplating or anticipating reconsideration of their stand on economic sanctions against South Africa. The speaker pointed out that the multi-party negotiations were a process which disappointingly precluded direct intervention by the international community. The security situation was precarious in that one party to the negotiation process had control of the police and the army. The violence sweeping the country was aided and abetted by the regime's monopoly of coercive power. His Government reiterated the position of the Harare Declaration of the Southern African Tripartite Conference on Apartheid taken in 1992. Any measures taken by the Committee must be informed and guided by the principled position of the national liberation movement in South Africa. The ILO should recommend to the UN and all other international, supranational and regional organizations that there should be no relaxation or suspension of action against apartheid until the international community was certain that the negotiations had reached a definite irreversible phase. The ILO could assist the situation in southern Africa, characterized by the war in Angola, strife in Mozambique and violence in South Africa, by taking any conceivable action which could hasten the dismantling of apartheid.

24. The Government member of Nigeria welcomed the impressive and detailed Special Report of the Director-General. He welcomed the positive developments that were taking place in South Africa. The speaker expressed worry and alarm at the scale of violence in the country which might endanger the talks now in progress. Individually and collectively support should be given to the various parties that are genuinely involved in the transformation to a democratic society until apartheid was dismantled. His Government believed that the time was not yet ripe to withdraw the Declaration. To do so would send the wrong signals to the authorities in South Africa and would reduce the effectiveness of international pressure against apartheid. The ILO should increase its technical assistance to workers and progressive employers. The speaker welcomed the proposal to form a non-racial employers' association and asked the ILO to assist the process. The ILO should play a major role in giving advice on labour.

25. The Workers' member of China welcomed the democratic process taking place in South Africa. He pointed out that the democratic forces had contributed to the struggle for freedom and that in April multi-party negotiations, attended by 26 organizations, had started to discuss a constitution. As a result of the negotiations some resolutions condemning violence in the black townships were adopted and pledged to take measures to end violence. The speaker declared a new, more concrete phase in the negotiations had begun and that the path to democracy was still a long way off. Those who did not accept this perspective of change threatened the negotiating process; the assassination of Chris Hani was an example. The workers of China supported the just struggle of the people of South Africa and followed the developments in the country. The speaker stressed that the key to the solution of the problem lay in constitutional talks and an end to the violence. Therefore, it was the responsibility of the Government to create the conditions necessary for the birth of democracy in South Africa.

26. The Workers' member from Finland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic trade unions, warned against too much optimism and pointed out that apartheid had not disappeared; the majority of the people did not have the vote. The positive changes which had taken place were actually the result of the hard work of the liberation movements and the democratic trade unions, the ILO and the international community. There was still much to be done. The main apartheid laws had been repealed but some still remained. Negotiations had resumed after the deadlock of CODESA II last year. There was still no free political activity. Domestic, agricultural and public sector workers still had no trade union rights. The speaker expressed concern about the violence and pointed out that a large ICFTU delegation that visited South Africa last February had implicated the Government and security forces directly or indirectly in the violence. The Nordic trade unions would continue to support COSATU and NACTU. She believed that the Declaration was not obsolete. The Declaration would be suspended only on condition that a final date for free and fair elections has been agreed on, the Transitional Executive Council is in place and the democratic non-racial trade unions so request. A plan of action for technical assistance could then be implemented to help rebuild the country. The ILO should continue technical assistance to the trade unions. Technical assistance should also be given to non-racial employers' organizations and tripartite bodies.

27. The Workers' member from the United Kingdom welcomed the positive reports of COSATU and NACTU and their support for negotiations to end apartheid. He welcomed the proposal of 27 April 1994 as a date for elections to a constitutent assembly. The speaker expressed concern at the failure to set up a non-racial body to oversee broadcasting which was essential if there was to be a free and fair election. Before elections could be held there must be control of the army and security forces which have played a role in the violence. An interim government should be established without delay. The disparity in wealth between the whites and blacks was too big. There would absolutely be no progress and democracy would fail unless the hundreds of thousands of unemployed black youngsters had jobs. Only a joint transitional executive council could put an end to the violence and tackle the huge economic problems the country was facing. There should be economic aid to enable the Government to address vital economic problems. The ILO should maintain the Declaration as long as the power structures that sustain apartheid remain in existence. The ILO should provide support to non-racial organizations and to a transitional executive authority in the period leading up to elections. There would be a need for aid for a long time to undo the economic imbalance caused by apartheid.

28. The Government member of Egypt stated that his Government followed with great interest the evolution which has taken place to establish a truly democratic regime in South Africa; the positive developments which have been realized, allowed one to hope for the complete elimination of apartheid. Egypt supported all measures aimed at eliminating the fundamentals of apartheid, and called for genuine steps leading to that end. In this regard the setting of April 1994 as a date for holding elections with a view to drafting a new constituion for that country based on the principles of democracy, justice and respect for human rights was welcomed. The speaker pointed out the alarming perpetration of acts of violence which threatened the process of change. He nevertheless, expressed satisfaction at the progress achieved in the process of transition to democracy in South Africa as reported in the special report of the Director General. The speaker noted that the essential role which was played in that respect by the non-Governmental organizations in general and by workers and employers organizations in particular, was but a manifestation of the interaction of the democractic forces in South Africa. This process of change had reached an irreversible stage. The ILO should play a preponderant role within its field of competence to help the process of democratization and ensure the application of international standards which would allow the restoration of confidence in the country. For example, technical assistance to non-racial workers' and employers' organizations could be increased and the supervision of the application of labour legislation should be enhanced. To assume its responsibilities the international community should adopt a plan of action to respond to concrete progress made in the direction of the eradication of apartheid and the establishment of a just society. The speaker concluded by referring to the important resolution at the last (49th) session of the Commission on Human Rights (1993/19) concerning «Monitoring the transition to democracy in South Africa» and appointment of a special rapporteur with the task of presenting an annual report on the transiton to democracy in South Africa.

29. The Workers' member from Namibia paid tribute to the Director-General for the Special Report on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid. He expressed a word of caution to the members of the Committee not to be too optimistic about developments in South Africa. In Namibia, an agreement was reached on a timetable for independence, but ten years passed before elections were held. The same delaying tactics may well be used in South Africa. Apartheid had yet to be dismantled and a climate for free and fair elections established. This would require control over the security forces, the state-controlled media, and other departments. He appealed to the Committee not to suspend the Declaration, to continue to prepare the Special Report, and to distribute the questionnaire, and to maintain the Committee for some time after the holding of elections in South Africa in order to address the legacy of apartheid. Finally, he appealed for increased support for democratic workers' organizations in South Africa.

30. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic drew attention to his Government's reply to the questionnaire, as contained in the Director-General's Special Report. Syria had always believed in freedom from discrimination and hence their reply was an accurate reflection of this and their compliance with ILO and UN resolutions on the question of apartheid in South Africa. Syria had severed all relations with South Africa and rendered no assistance whatsoever to the South African Government. He congratulated the ILO on its innovative efforts to eradicate apartheid. The Committee should adopt constructive recommendations to eliminate discrimination, similar to those contained in UN General Assembly resolution 47/116A which called on the international community to continue its efforts aimed at eliminating apartheid.

31. The Workers' member from Cyprus noted that the long-held wish for the disappearance of the Committee was nearing realization as a result of the struggle of the South African people together with the solidarity of the international community, including that of the Committee. Although much progress had been made towards democracy in South Africa, it remained fragile because of the extensive use of violence. Private armies, particularly of the extreme right, were preparing to wage total war against the ANC, similar to that in Angola. It was therefore a priority to stop the violence and prevent a civil war. To this end the Declaration should remain in force and a revised and updated programme of action should be proposed by the Committee. That programme should maintain sanctions until an interim government was formed and elections held for a constituent assembly, after which a phased lifting of sanctions could be considered. The international community had a lot of work to do to ensure the success of the 30-year-old anti-apartheid struggle. Violence should be condemned and at the same time the urgent needs of South African society should be addressed, including education and training programmes. He concluded by congratulating COSATU, NACTU, the ANC and all democratic and non-racial forces for their achievements, thanked the Director-General for his Report, and complimented the Committee and the ILO for their contribution.

32. The Government member of the United States drew attention to one consistent theme in the interventions, the dawning of a new day in South Africa that would lead to a non-racial, democratic society sooner or later. Her Government supported the Harare Conference recommendation encouraging the ILO to undertake efforts in South Africa to assist free and democratic trade unions and non-racial employers' organizations. The United States believed that considerable progress had already been achieved toward dismantling the apartheid system as the South Africans themselves had told the Committee. The ILO had a key role to play in bringing about dialogue and cooperation. The progress achieved in South Africa could not go unrecognized by the Committee, and it was important to note that many aspects of the Declaration had been overtaken by events and no longer applied. Sanctions and embargoes, except for the sale of arms, could be counter-productive to the achievement of goals such as job creation and raising the standard of living for the impoverished in South Africa. Her government viewed with alarm the escalation of violence and condemned it. But rather than focus on the past the ILO should focus its attention on building on the progress made thus far, to focus on what it could achieve instead of on what it could not. The US supported pressing on to ensure that South Africa did not retreat from progress toward a non-racial multiparty democracy, but it regarded the carrot to be as effective as the stick. The most straightforward approach might be to amend the Declaration especially with respect to the severence of economic, cultural and sporting ties. The ILO should be granted the maximum flexibility to suspend the Declaration once conditions so warranted. The member noted that these conclusions and recommendations corresponded closely to those of the group of independent experts and the Committee on Discrimination. She expressed hope that in 1994 the ILO could say that it had helped the parties in South Africa to reach workable and lasting solutions that would ensure that apartheid was well on its way to being dead and gone forever.

33. The Employers' member from India stressed that measures should be taken at all levels to ensure safety, security and economic growth in South Africa. Employment-oriented industries, small businesses, and the self-employed should all be encouraged in order to eradicate poverty and generate employment. Technical and financial assistance should be given by international institutions to generate economic growth in South Africa which had experienced negative growth for five years. He thanked the ILO for its activities and the Special Report, and expressed the hope that the Committee would make concrete suggestions so that the ILO could make a positive contribution to upliftment in South Africa.

34. The Workers' member from Nigeria noted that progress towards democracy in South Africa since the release of Mr. Mandela had been disappointing. The Government was employing delaying tactics, and the internal contradictions between various black groups was very disturbing. He called on the international community to mediate between antagonistic groups, and suggested that power-sharing was essential for the negotiations to succeed. The Nigeria Labour Congress would continue to support progressive forces in South Africa and would not reduce its support at this time.

35. The Workers' member from Mozambique pointed out that many Mozambican workers worked in the mines and on the farms of South Africa under exploitative conditions. The Nkomati accord signed between Mozambique and South Africa had opened up the possibility of the CODESA talks in South Africa, and a peace agreement had been signed between the Mozambican Government and Renamo. These developments were linked and so it was appropriate that the two countries walk the last mile towards peace together. He thanked the ILO Workers' Education Branch for their assistance to workers in Mozambique and expressed the hope that they would find ways of including Mozambican workers in workers' education activities in South Africa.

36. The Government member of the Russian Federation observed that three conclusions could be drawn from the Special Report of the Director-General. First, developments over the last year, notably agreement on an election date, confirmed that a transition towards democracy was under way. The policies of the Russian Federation were designed to ensure favourable conditions for that transition through maintenance of the mandatory sanctions imposed by the Security Council coupled with a stage-by-stage development of bilateral relations with South Africa. Secondly, it was clear that a cautious approach should be adopted towards the achievements so far. The violence that threatened the transition had to be condemned and all constructive forces working for democracy should receive international support. Thirdly, the ILO and the UN had played positive roles in fighting apartheid and promoting democratic values in South Africa. Such constructive interaction should continue. He called for increased ILO technical assistance to workers' and employers' organizations in South Africa for it was they who would construct a democratic society.

37. The Workers' member from Zimbabwe noted that the Special Report of the Director-General and the interventions of South African trade union leaders underlined the important role played by international pressure in bringing about the transition towards democracy in South Africa. Although that transition seemed to be almost irreversible, South Africa would be beset by the legacy of apartheid and concerted action would be required at national, regional, and international levels. Sanctions should be maintained to speed up the process of change, in line with UN decisions. The ILO should continue to support the efforts of democratic trade unions to extend basic worker rights to all workers, particularly in the farm and domestic service sectors and those in the Bantustans. Activities of the ILO Workers' Education Branch should be expanded and adapted to the needs of the transition and post-apartheid periods. He urged the ILO to maintain the Declaration but enable the Governing Body to suspend it once the elected constituent assembly was in place and when the liberation movements and trade unions indicated that it was appropriate to do so.

38. A Workers' observer from Ghana saluted the courage shown by trade unions in South Africa in standing up to the obnoxious system of apartheid. Those in the international community who supported them should do nothing to send the wrong signal to the protagonists of apartheid. Pressure had to be maintained on the apartheid system to ensure that it was rooted out. In this regard, the international community should be guided by those inside the country fighting apartheid. He cautioned governments and businesses who were preparing to go into South Africa to act responsibly as their decisions would affect future generations in South Africa.

39. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the establishment of an interim government in South Africa would have been a clear signal indicating the course to follow concerning the Declaration on Action against Apartheid during the present session of the Conference. Unfortunately, no agreement had been reached so far on this issue. Although the tentative date of the elections had been announced the previous week, many important issues remained unresolved at the multi-party negotiating forum. The already complex process towards creating a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa was becoming increasingly vulnerable. The prospect for the first-ever one-person one-vote elections expected to take place on 27 April 1994, was under constant threat of escalating political violence. At this critical stage of the ongoing reform process in South Africa, it was imperative that the international community maintain its vigilance, play an ever greater role in curbing the violence and continue to press for an early political settlement. The Workers' group continued to support fully the process of negotiations under way in South Africa aimed at creating a democratic society based on principles of equality and social justice, and full respect for human and trade union rights, and welcomed the renewed hope for the setting up of a Transitional Executive Council (TEC) very soon. South Africa remained a society dominated by extreme and institutionalized racial discrimination and exploitation, which had skewed the economy, political structures and social attitudes. As the country entered the transitional phase, and eventually the post-apartheid period, these deep-seated inequalities inherent in the systems and structures of society, together with increasing unemployment and widespread poverty needed to be addressed. It was therefore essential that the ongoing political reform process was accompanied by a parallel programme of affirmative action to achieve the rapid social and economic restructuring required to rebuild the society. In this context, the United Nations General Assembly, in its resolution 46/79A of 13 December 1991 appealed, inter alia, «to the international community to increase its material, financial and other contributions to the victims and opponents of apartheid to help them address the glaring socio-economic inequalities, particularly in areas of education, health, housing and social welfare». The hope for a new future for the black people of South Africa could only become a reality if rapid progress were made towards the elimination of apartheid. The Conference should therefore request all governments to maintain appropriate forms of pressure on South Africa as a lever to speed up the process of change in line with decisions of the United Nations as embodied in its General Assembly resolution 47/116A of 7 December 1992. The Conference should further call on all governments to observe fully the United Nations mandatory arms embargo and to maintain and enforce an oil embargo against South Africa, until they have been officially lifted. The Conference should welcome the multi-party negotiations which resumed on 1 April 1993 and reiterate its call on all parties concerned to make every effort to conclude an agreement on a new non-racial and democratic constitution and to set up as soon as possible a non-racial interim government. The Workers believed that the Conference should express its deep concern to the escalation of political violence in South Africa which had claimed the lives of 16,000 people since 1984, including a large number of workers. Thousands of people had been seriously injured and maimed. There was grave concern that the persistence of violence constituted a major threat to the process of negotiations for a united, non-racial and democratic society. The Conference therefore should call on all constituent Members of the ILO to urge the South African Government and all parties concerned to cooperate in combating violence and to exercise restraint and stress the need to strengthen the mechanism set up under the National Peace Accord of September 1991. The Conference should also welcome the deployment of international observers from the United Nations, the OAU, the Commonwealth and the European Community in South Africa to further the purposes of the National Peace Accord. It should further welcome the initative taken by the independent non-racial trade union organizations, COSATU and NACTU together with the representatives of the international free trade union movement stationed in South Africa, to establish a Trade Union Violence Monitoring Group to monitor violence, violations of trade union rights and attacks on trade unionists and to mobilize international solidarity actions. The Conference therefore should call on the ILO to provide assistance to the democratic non-racial trade union organizations in their efforts to monitor the prevailing violence. The Conference further should call for strengthening the role of the UN and other international observer missions in South Africa in order that they are able to play a proactive role both in peace-keeping and peace-making; and in particular so that they are involved in the permanent monitoring of the situation in the country and especially during the elections to ensure that they are free and fair. In this regard, as millions of people will be voting for the first time in their life, the Conference should urge the ILO and all governments to make maximum assistance available to the non-racial democratic trade union movement and other democratic forces in the field of voter education, democratic practice and political tolerance by means of seminars, workshops, mass media campaigns and similar projects in both urban and rural areas of the country. Noting that millions of people living in the so-called homelands (Bantustans) do not still enjoy South African citizenship, the Conference should call on the South African Government to repeal the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act and to take urgent measures to reincorporate the Bantustans into the South African State. The Conference should urge the South African Government to take steps to repeal the remaining discriminatory apartheid legislation, particularly the Electoral Act of 1979, and to introduce the measures necessary to correct entrenched socio-economic inequalities, particularly in the areas of education, health, housing and social welfare. Noting with grave concern that workers in the Bantustans continue to be denied basic trade union rights, the Conference should urge the Government of South Africa to expedite measures to ensure that basic labour legislation in accordance with the principles laid down in the ILO instruments be extended to cover those workers as well as domestic and farmworkers and workers in the public sector. Noting that the term of office of the Group of Independent Experts has come to an end, the Conference should express its deep appreciation of the work of the Group during the past four years to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid, whose findings and conclusions have been of considerable help to the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. Recognizing the importance of the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration of June 1991, the Programme of Action annexed to it and the conclusions contained in paragraph 62 of the report of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa held from 5 to 8 May 1992 and endorsed by the 1992 Committee on Action against Apartheid, the Conference should call on all governments, employers' and workers' organizations, as well as the ILO, to make all efforts during the present period of ongoing reform process in South Africa, and take such actions as are required to bring about the total elimination of apartheid and the creation of a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa. The Conference should call on South African employers to play a direct role in addressing the violence in industry and in the country in general and in acting to speed the process to the installation of a democratic government. This should include their widescale participation in peace structures and dispute resolution committees at all levels together with material support for the victims of violence. The Conference should note that the recommendations of the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, if implemented, could form the basis for a sound legislative framework for industrial relations in South Africa. The Conference therefore should urge the South African Government to implement these recommendations in line with its agreement with COSATU of November 1992. It also should call on the employer body, SACCOLA, to commit itself fully to this process and to continue to work for the early creation of a non-racial employers' organization. The Conference should request the ILO to be actively involved in the implementation of the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission. The Conference should call on national governments which had not already done so to contribute specialist investigative personnel to the Goldstone Commission set up by the Government of South Africa. Such experts and specialists will have an important impact on the South African police force, both in disciplinary terms and in offering practical assistance and support as it adapts and develops itself to move from a force dedicated to law enforcement to a police providing a full range of services demanded by the community in a new South Africa. The Conference should also express its hope that an early solution would be found by all parties concerned for the joint control of the armed formations in South Africa. The Conference should welcome the recent positive political developments in South Africa but should consider that all the objectives set forth in operative paragraph 3 of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa have not been attained. If a non-racial interim government is established in South Africa before the session of the Governing Body in November 1993, and should the conditions exist then that would warrant a reconsideration of the ILO action against apartheid, the Conference should request the Governing Body to put an item concerning the review of the Declaration and Plan of Action on the agenda of the 1994 International Labour Conference.

40. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a number of draft conclusions. The Conference should note with satisfaction that agreement in principle had been reached on a date — 27 April 1994 — for free and democratic elections for a constituent assembly which would draft a constitution for a non-racial democratic South Africa. The Conference should express once again its great concern about the ongoing violence in South Africa and reiterate that a climate of free political activity cannot exist in such an atmosphere of violence. The Conference should underline the role played by the tripartite constituents of the National Peace Accord in curbing the still prevailing violence. It should also welcome the increasingly important role played by the international organizations and observers in monitoring the violence. In this connection, the Conference should underline the continuing importance of assistance and advice from the international community to assist in the management of internal security in general. The Conference should urge the South African Government to extend expeditiously labour legislation to domestic and farm workers and workers in the public sector, and should reiterate that this legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down in ILO Conventions. The Conference should urge the South African Government to implement expeditiously the recommendations made by the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission. The Conference should note with satisfaction the ongoing efforts being made to establish a non-racial employer organization in South Africa in accordance with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Conference should urge the Director-General of the ILO to continue to give technical assistance to the democratic trade union movement in South Africa and to extend assistance to a non-racial employers' organization. Assistance should also be given to the recently established tripartite bodies such as the reconstructed National Manpower Commission and the National Economic Forum. The Conference, recognizing the scale of the problem, should call on the international community to provide assistance especially to the youth in South Africa who, because of the current situation, had not received adequate education and training. In this context, since the ILO has a major role to play, the Conference should request the Director-General to formulate a plan of action which should encompass, inter alia, the following: employment creation; labour administration; coordination and stratification of labour market institutions; labour relations and collective bargaining; productivity; manpower training and human resources management. The Conference should recommend that the principles laid down in the ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy are implemented by those parties in South Africa to whom it is addressed. The Conference should also recommend that the Director-General promote this Tripartite Declaration. In view of the desirability of close ILO involvement in South Africa, particularly during the early years of transition, the Conference should recommend that the Director-General establish an effective and meaningful ILO presence in that country. Given the sensitivity of the tasks at hand, officials involved in ILO work in the country and, in particular, those staff members that would be stationed there should be carefully selected and, where appropriate, in consultation with the tripartite partners that would be served by such an office. The Conference should mandate the Director-General, once an interim government takes office, to suspend the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and set into force, as soon as possible, the plans of action stated above. If circumstances permit, the ILO Governing Body should be requested to put on the agenda of the 1994 Conference a proposal to rescind the Declaration on Action against Apartheid. The Conference would look forward to welcoming, at the 1994 Conference, a non-racial tripartite delegation from South Africa.

41. The Committee set up a Working Party to prepare the conclusions of the Committee. It was composed of five Government members: Cuba, Denmark, United States, United Republic of Tanzania, Zimbabwe; five Employers' members: Mr. Amonoo (Ghana), Miss Hak (Netherlands), Mr. Hernandez (Philippines), Mr. Cheshire (United Kingdom), Mr. Owuor (Kenya); and five Workers' members: Mrs. Carr (Canada), Mr. Grantham (United Kingdom), Miss Korhonen (Finland), Mr. Lescault (USA), Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe). The Reporter of the Committee acted as Chairman of the Working Party and subsequently introduced its conclusions.

42. The General Secretary of COSATU, speaking to the adoption of the report, pointed out that the international community and the ILO had a responsibility and obligation to ensure that apartheid was thoroughly eliminated. South Africa found itself at a crossroads. A tentative date had been set for elections to the constituent assembly, but there were powerful forces opposed to the holding of free and fair elections. He appealed to the ILO to affirm the election date, to assist in the education of voters, to support the peace initiatives, and to monitor the elections. Even after the holding of democratic elections however, the economic consequences of apartheid would remain, and the ILO had a crucial role to play in helping to eradicate those. The conclusions that had been adopted provided a good basis for addressing the needs of the majority in South Africa through job creation, improvements in the standard of living, education and training, and the development of strong tripartite institutions. He envisaged such ILO technical cooperation taking the form of a programme of action to give assistance to the democratic trade unions and tripartite institutions after the entry into force of the Transitional Executive Council in the next month or two. The Declaration could then be reviewed at the next Governing Body meeting and considered at the next ILC.

43. The draft conclusions arrived at in the Working Party were introduced in the Committee by the Reporter. He indicated that, after considering proposals that had been submitted on behalf of the Employers' and Workers' groups as well as submissions which had been made by some Government members, it had been possible to arrive at an agreed text by consensus in respect of most of the paragraphs contained in the draft. He went on to indicate that there had, however, been some paragraphs on which this had not been possible, either as regards the entire content or as regards parts or phrases therein; and that in respect of others, there had been insufficient time available to consider the proposals fully. The draft as submitted indicated these situations by indicating the paragraphs, or portions thereof, on which there had been no agreement.

44. The Committee then proceeded to consider the draft, as submitted, and adopted each of the conclusions set out in paragraph 47 below after an exchange of views which involved, inter alia, agreement on a number of amendments to the text as submitted by the Working Party.

45. In respect of all but one subparagraph the adoption of the text took place without a vote. In respect of the final subparagraph in paragraph 47 below, the Committee took its decision on two amendments by a vote. The first of these related to a proposal by the Employers' group that the final five words of the subparagraph should read "... the future of the Declaration". In a vote by show of hands, the amendment was defeated by 251 votes to 230. Upon a request by the Employers' group for a roll-call vote, this amendment was rejected by 232 votes to 230. A roll-call vote then took place on an amendment proposed by the Workers' group to omit the words "or rescission" after the word "review" in the phrase "review [or rescission] of the Declaration" at the end of this subparagraph. The amendment was carried by 232 votes to 230, with the result that the words placed in parenthesis above were omitted. On behalf of the Employers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee recorded the understanding of his group that the term "review" included within its purview the suspension, amendment and rescission of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania stated for the record that the word "review" in subparagraph 21 of the conclusions implied an objective and impartial examination of the situation in South Africa. If it appeared that there had not been developments in accordance with the stipulation concerning the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, that Declaration would be maintained and implemented. An Employers' member (Miss Hak) recorded her personal reservation concerning subparagraph 17, because the proposal to set up an ILO presence in South Africa was not accepted. He expressed the opinion that the proposed plan of action constitutes an enormous task to the ILO which could not be properly implemented without an ILO presence in the country.

CONCLUSIONS

46. The Committee examined the Special Report of the Director-General concerning the Application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and other documents submitted to it, including the report of the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body at its 256th Session in May 1993 and the report of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid.

47. In the light of its discussions, the Committee invites the Conference to approve the following conclusions:

(1) The Conference welcomes the multi-party negotiations which resumed on 1 April 1993 and reiterates its call on all parties concerned to make every effort to set up as soon as possible a non-racial Transitional Executive Council (TEC).[1] The Conference notes with satisfaction that agreement has been reached on a proposed date (27 April 1994) for free and democratic elections, for a constituent assembly to draft a constitution for a non-racial democratic South Africa. The Conference urges all parties concerned to adhere to this date.

(2) As millions of people will be voting for the first time in their life, the Conference urges the ILO, other appropriate international institutions and all governments to make maximum assistance available to the non-racial democratic trade union movement and other democratic forces in the fields of voter education, democratic practice and political tolerance by means of seminars, workshops, mass media campaigns and similar projects in both urban and rural areas of the country.

(3) The Conference expresses once again its deep concern about the continuing violence in South Africa, which has claimed many thousands of lives, including a large number of workers. It emphasizes that a climate of free political activity cannot exist in such an atmosphere of violence, which also constitutes a major threat to the process of negotiations for a united, non-racial and democratic society.

(4) The Conference calls on all constituent Members of the ILO to urge the South African Government and all parties concerned to cooperate in combating violence and to exercise restraint. It stresses the need to strengthen the mechanism set up by the tripartite constituents of the National Peace Accord of September 1991, to curb the violence still prevailing.

(5) The Conference welcomes the important involvement and assistance provided by international and regional organizations (including the UN, the OAU, the Commonwealth and the EC) as observers in contributing to the work of the National Peace Accord in monitoring and reducing violence. It calls for a strengthening of this role, in relation to the ongoing process of democratization, and also expresses the hope that governments which have not yet done so will find it possible to provide specialist investigative personnel to the Commission on the Prevention of Violence and Intimidation (Goldstone Commission).

(6) The Conference welcomes the establishment by the independent non-racial trade unions, COSATU and NACTU, of the Trade Union Violence Monitoring Group with the assistance of the international free trade union movement and calls on the ILO to lend its full support to the organizations involved in this process.

(7) The Conference recognizes the importance for free and fair elections and stresses the need to transform the police force into an institution which is responsive to the needs of the entire South African community. It expresses the hope that an early solution will be found by all parties concerned for the joint control of the armed forces and formations in South Africa.

(8) The Conference calls on South African employers to continue to play a direct role in preventing and helping to monitor the violence in industry and in the country in general and in acting to speed up the process of the installation of a democratic Government. This should include participation in peace structures and dispute resolution committees at all levels. The employers should also be urged to provide material support for the victims of violence.

(9) The Conference urges the South African Government to take steps to repeal the remaining discriminatory apartheid legislation, including the Electoral Act of 1979, and to introduce measures necessary to correct entrenched socio-economic inequalities, particularly in the areas of education, health, housing and social welfare.

(10) Noting that millions of people living in the so-called homelands (Bantustans) still do not enjoy South African citizenship, the Conference calls on the South African Government to repeal the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act and to take urgent measures to reincorporate the Bantustans into the South African State before the elections. Noting with grave concern that workers in the Bantustans continue to be denied basic trade union rights, the Conference urges the Government of South Africa to expedite measures to ensure that basic labour legislation is extended to cover those workers.

(11) The Conference urges the South African Government to extend expeditiously labour legislation to domestic and farmworkers and workers in the public sector, and reiterates that this legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down in ILO Conventions.

(12) The Conference requests all governments to maintain appropriate forms of pressure on South Africa as a lever to speed up the process of change in line with decisions of the United Nations as embodied in General Assembly resolution 47/116A of 7 December 1992. The Conference further calls on all governments to observe fully the United Nations mandatory arms embargo and to maintain and enforce an oil embargo against South Africa, until they have been officially lifted.

(13) Recognizing the importance of the recommendations contained in the updated Declaration of June 1991, the Programme of Action annexed to it and the conclusions contained in paragraph 62 of the report of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa held from 5 to 8 May 1992 and endorsed by the 1992 Session of the International Labour Conference, the Conference calls on all governments, employers' and workers' organizations, as well as the ILO, to continue their efforts to bring about the total elimination of apartheid and the creation of a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa.

(14) The Conference wishes to express its deep appreciation of the work of the Group of Independent Experts during the past four years to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid. The Group's findings and conclusions have been of considerable help to the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and the Governing Body should undertake continued and adequate monitoring.

(15) The Conference urges the South African Government to implement expeditiously the recommendations of the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, which form the basis for a sound legislative framework for industrial relations in South Africa in consultation with the National Manpower Commission. The Conference requests the Director-General of the ILO to assist in every way possible with the implementation of these recommendations.

(16) The Conference recommends that the principles laid down in the ILO Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy be implemented by those concerned in South Africa. The Conference also recommends that the Director-General take steps to promote this process.

(17) The Conference stresses the important role that is to be played by the ILO in the provision of technical assistance after the Transitional Executive Council (TEC) has been established, and accordingly requests the Director-General to formulate a plan of action. The Governing Body may make available the necessary financial means to implement this plan of action which could encompass, inter alia, the following:

- trade union and human rights;
- employment creation;
- promotion of self-employment and small and medium-sized enterprises;
- reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration;
- labour relations and collective bargaining;
- the effective use of all factors of production;
- improvement of labour legislation and upgrading of labour standards;
- improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farmworkers;
- education and training;
- manpower training and human resources management;
- promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment;
- occupational health and safety.

The Conference recognizes the magnitude of the problems affecting the youth of South Africa as a result of the deprivation to which they have been subjected in the fields of education and training and urges that account be taken of their needs in formulating the above programme.

(18) The Conference urges the Director-General of the ILO to continue to give technical assistance to the democratic trade union movement in South Africa. Assistance should also be given to the recently established tripartite bodies such as the restructured National Manpower Commission and the National Economic Forum.

(19) The Conference notes with satisfaction the ongoing efforts being made to establish a non-racial employer organization in South Africa in accordance, inter alia, with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference. It urges the Director-General of the ILO to extend assistance to a non-racial employers' organization, once it is formed.

(20) The Conference urges that in the period prior to the election of a Constituent Assembly, the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid should be maintained. However, when a Transitional Executive Council (TEC) is set up in South Africa, the Governing Body is authorized to review the application and implementation of the Declaration, in order to enable the plan of action stated above to be implemented, conditional on unequivocal progress on the objectives contained in paragraph 3 of the Declaration, and a request to the ILO from the Transitional Executive Council, the South African independent and democratic trade union confederations and the non-racial employers' organizations for such a review.

(21) While welcoming the recent political developments in South Africa, the Conference requests the Director-General to report to the Governing Body in November 1993 on progress made towards the elimination of apartheid, including the establishment of a Transitional Executive Council, an electoral commission, an independent media commission and measures taken to hold the general election. The Conference requests the Governing Body, if it is satisfied that conditions exist then that would warrant a reconsideration of the ILO action against apartheid, to put an item on the agenda of the 1994 International Labour Conference concerning the review of the Declaration.

Eighteenth sitting

Presidents: Mr. Abdel-Hak and Mr. Tabani

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The first item on our agenda this morning is the eighth report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 5G). If there are no objections I shall take it that this report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the second item, which is the second report of the Credentials Committee.

We have just received a letter from the EEC, which I call upon the Clerk of the Conference to read.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – We have indeed received a letter from Mr. Jorgensen dated 15 June 1993, which reads as follows:

"Mr. President,

The European Community and its member States have taken note of the second report of the Credentials Committee on the subject of the credentials of Zaire and would like to have the following statement read out in the plenary at the time of the adoption of this report.

> On the occasion of the approval of the Second Report of the Credentials Committee, in particular the adoption of the credentials issued on behalf of Zaire, the European Community and its member States wish to state that they do not acknowledge the appointment as Prime Minister of Mr. Faustin Birindira, which was made without the approval of the High Council of the Republic and which consequently does not form part of the process of transition defined by the Sovereign National Conference.

Yours sincerely,

P. Jorgensen."

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I call upon Mr. Ausman, Government delegate of Canada, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. AUSMAN (Government delegate, Canada; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – The second report of the Credentials Committee, which I am pleased to present, is contained in Provisional Record No. 14 and mainly reflects the Committee's extensive discussions on the representation at this Conference of the Republic of Zaire. It also reports on the Committee's findings that two objections before it were not receivable under the Standing Orders as their authors were serving as advisers to the delegates to whom they were objecting. In addition, mention is made of communications that were relevant to the nomination of the Workers' delegates of two other countries but did not in themselves constitute objections.

Returning to the case of Zaire, credentials had been received from three sources: two from different authorities claiming to be the Government of that country and one from the Permanent Mission of Zaire in Geneva. The question facing the Commission was which delegation should be taken into consideration. The Committee sought guidance at first from the United Nations Office of Legal Affairs. That Office considered the only directly relevant precedent, last month's World Health Assembly, and the Committee heard representations from both claimant Governments. For the reasons given in some detail in the report, which I commend to you, the Committee concluded that the information before it provided no valid criteria for determining which was the legitimate Government of Zaire. It decided, however, to take into consideration the credentials issued by the Permanent Mission of Zaire in Geneva on the clear understanding that this did not imply recognition of the Government whose representatives were included in those credentials. Such recognition is a matter for the member States themselves individually and collectively, in the United Nations General Assembly.

The Committee felt that it should act on the credentials issued by the Permanent Mission partly because of the limitations of the Committee's own mandate and partly because it was not seriously contested that the Permanent Representative of Zaire in Geneva had been accredited by the United Nations Office in Geneva and had legal capacity to issue credentials.

The report is submitted to the Conference for its information. It does not call for any debate. I would stress in respect to Zaire that the Committee is not expressing any opinion on the content or the validity of the credentials that it recognized. The Committee has no competence to do so at this stage. All it has done is to present to the Conference the list of delegates of Zaire for the purposes of the Standing Orders which permit any interested party to lodge any objection it so wishes.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The Chairman of the Committee has given us his recommendations and comments. We therefore take note of the report without debate.

(The report is noted.)

SPECIAL REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE ON THE COMMITTEE'S ENTITLEMENT TO DEAL WITH THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE SITUATION IN RWANDA: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the Special Report of the Resolutions Committee on the Committee's entitlement to deal with the resolution concerning the situation in Rwanda.

We have to give an opinion on a resolution concerning Rwanda which was submitted to the Conference by a person whose credentials had not been received.

I call on Mr. Mascia, Government adviser, Italy, Chairman of the Committee, to submit this report.

Mr. MASCIA (Government adviser, Italy; Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – You have before you a special report of the Resolutions Committee. It is unusual to have a special report in our Committee but we had to deal with an unusual situation. One of the resolutions, the one concerning the situation in Rwanda, had been submitted by a Workers' delegate whose credentials had not been received at the time the resolutions were published in the Provisional Record. That resolution was therefore not published with the others.

Two issues were discussed in this respect by the Committee. First of all, to be receivable, should a resolution be received within the 15 days' time-limit laid down in the Standing Orders from a delegate who is already accredited? And is a resolution receivable if it is not made available to delegates within 48 hours after the expiry of that time-limit? As is evident from the report, the Committee, after some discussion and having heard the opinion of the Legal Adviser, agreed to deal with the resolution in question but did not wish to create a precedent by doing so. The Committee also requested the Office to change this practice in future and to publish such a resolution while making it clear in a footnote that the author's credentials had not been received.

The special report is submitted for your information.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Does anyone wish to take the floor? If there are no objections, I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I call upon Mr. Chotard, Government delegate, France, Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, to submit the reports.

Original French: Mr. CHOTARD (Government delegate, France; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the second and third reports of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. These reports have been published in Provisional Record No. 17, and they contain the recommendations of the Committee concerning the matters placed before it. The resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference in this connection appear at the end of each of the reports.

The main item submitted to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, of course, concerns the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1994-95. It is the tradition to submit a budget every two years. This one is particularly important and rather different from previous ones.

It is a realistic budget and a reforming budget. It is realistic because it has taken into account the various savings which the Governing Body had suggested, but it is also a reforming budget because it is designed and aimed at enabling the Organization to respond better to the various demands and needs of member States. It does this in two directions in particular.

The first is the strength and presence of the ILO in the field, in particular by the introduction of a new formula, the establishment of multidisciplinary teams. Secondly, it seems to increase in Geneva the capacity of the various technical departments. As the Director-General himself stressed in the Committee, this twofold orientation will make it possible to respond better to the specific objectives of the Organization, and, in particular, to the three major themes which were set out. First, the ILO's contribution to the process of democratization which is taking place in a number of member States. Secondly, the struggle against poverty and the problems of employment. And thirdly, the protection of workers – a traditional ILO activity which must not be cut back.

The Finance Committee, after having heard the Director-General, also heard statements by the Chairman of the Governing Body, Mr. Vargas Campos; the spokeswoman of the Employers, Miss Mackie, and the spokesman of the Workers, Mr. Vanni. These statements appear in the second report of the Committee, in paragraphs 27, 28, 29 to 33 and 34 to 36.

After the discussion, we took up the budget itself and noted that, as requested by the Governing Body, it was based on zero real growth. The total budget amounts to US$466,510,000, taking into account the provision for cost increases and exchange rate fluctuations. A summary of the budget of expenditure and income for 1994-95 appears again in Provisional Record No. 17, in Appendix III. You will find in Appendix IV a summary of proposed expenditure by major programme. We examined and adopted each of the programmes one by one and we made a number of comments on them. Finally, in Appendix V you will find a table showing the contributions due from member States. This then is the budget proposed for 1994-95.

The Committee then considered recommendations concerning the outstanding debts of member States; the change in treatment of income from the sales of publications; the Working Capital Fund; the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO; and the proposal concerning a gift of land by the Government of Pakistan. All these recommendations appear in the second report of the Committee.

Finally, at its last meeting, the Committee considered the contributions of the new member States. As regards the scale of contributions of member States for 1994, we did have some difficulties, particularly in the statements of the Republics of Moldova and Ukraine which both have problems with the scale of contributions fixed by the United Nations. However, the ILO cannot consider itself responsible for this and will do everything it can to examine these problems. We decided to limit to 1994 the decisions taken because we are expecting new studies in the meantime from the United Nations.

Finally, the last resolution, which is far from being the least important, was the actual adoption of the draft Programme and Budget. All these matters are covered in the Committee's third report.

I could not conclude this already too long but also too short statement without thanking the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Dr. Shah M. Farid, Government delegate of Bangladesh, and all the members of the Committee as well as the secretariat for the support which they gave the Chair.

In conclusion, I should like to say that for the adoption of our Programme and Budget for 1994-95, whether it is in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body, or indeed in the Finance Committee, we have had, as in all democratic organizations, very long and very important discussions where various views were stated and may yet be stated, but we hope that beyond all the difficulties, the three groups – Governments, Employers and Workers – believe that, despite these differences, it is important for the unity of the Organization that there should be a unanimous adoption of the budget. This is what I propose and what I request from the Conference.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France, Chairman of the Employers' group) – I would like to explain in a few words the position of the Employers' group on the Draft Programme and Budget for 1994-95.

First of all, the Employers' group of the Conference unanimously and unreservedly supports the position of the Employer members of the Governing Body, as described in paragraphs 5-15 and 522-528 of the report of the Governing Body's Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. As Chairman Chotard has reminded us, this position was also expressed in the Finance Committee by Miss Mackie, our spokeswoman, as reflected in paragraphs 29-33 of the report.

I will not go into details, which are sufficiently explained in the documents that I have referred to, but I would at this stage like to recall that since the February-March 1992 consultations, the Employer members of the Governing Body, on behalf of all their colleagues, had called for a refocusing of ILO priorities in the field of employment promotion, and for a greater emphasis on training and the development of job-creating enterprises. We also called for a modernization of ILO structures.

In its final form, the programme and budget certainly contain some interesting elements, particularly when it comes to better adapting the Organization's services to the needs of its members. However, the proposal has not come close enough to what we had requested. That is why, as our spokesperson has already pointed out, our position makes it impossible for us unreservedly to approve or categorically to reject the report, and we therefore abstained.

I would like here energetically to assert that the Employers support the International Labour Organization, that they recognize its historic role and that they want its work to be commensurate with the social challenges we face at the end of the twentieth century. It is in this spirit that we have prepared a document on an in-depth reform of the ILO which should be understood as a mark of our interest in the future of the Organization. It should be considered neither as an attack against persons or groups nor as a rejection of the fundamental principles of the ILO. It has been extensively commented on – and not always favourably – sometimes by some who have not read the document or not read it closely enough. This is why I hope very much that those of my fellow employer delegates who have not yet done so will communicate the document to their government and worker delegations. I trust they will recognize that this development is a sincere effort to propose to our partners certain reforms of the ILO, and an invitation to dialogue and reflection. I hope that it will be read in an objective and unprejudiced manner.

We know that some of the ideas we have advanced reflect the concerns of many colleagues in the other groups, as well as the concerns of the Director-General, who announced that he would devote his 1994 report to reflection on the future of the Organization.

Reforms in the functioning of the Governing Body and of the Conference are, we believe, only the start of a more far-reaching process. We therefore hope that the preparation of the next programme and budget will take into account the views of each group, and thus be approved unanimously and without reservations. For the moment, in order to mark our confidence in the International Labour Organization, in view of the significance of a vote of abstention, and in order to show that we do not intend to prevent the adoption of the proposals, or to obstruct the work of the Organization, the Employers' delegate as a whole will vote for the present budget. This, of course, does not imply any substantive change in the reservations that we had presented in February and March, or in our determination to press for reform in the most appropriate manner in future.

Original French: Mr. ZAPOROJAN (Government delegate, Moldova) – I would like to refer to the rate of assessment for contributions of the Republic of Moldova to the Organization's budget for 1992-93. This is of critical importance for the development of cooperation between our country and the Organization.

Since the international financial institutions – the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and other organizations – have not concluded their evaluation of our per capita gross national product, which serves as a basis for the calculation of the rate of assessment of contributions to the Organization, and given the economic and financial situation in Moldova which is extremely difficult, the Finance Committee which met on 11 June 1993 was asked by Mr. Dumitru Nidelcu, the Minister of Labour and Social Protection of the Moldovan Republic, provisionally to suspend for the next two years, the payment of Moldova's assessed contribution until such time as the above-mentioned international financial organizations have completed their consideration of the adjustment of our national statistics to international standards and have completed their new calculations.

On behalf of our Government I therefore ask for your assistance and support for this request which will enable us to mobilize our modest financial resources and to focus them on social security, particularly for the most disadvantaged sectors of our population.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden) – During the next biennium, we will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO. That is an important event and we should take it seriously.

And, I think we should take the opportunity and be a little bit self-critical – in a constructive way. We should question ourselves, our dogmas and commands. No one should be afraid of that, because if we really believe in them this should be a totally risk-free exercise. But also, if we believe in them – which I do – we might be able to find or develop new insights and make progress in terms of our aims and means.

There is very little of such a reflective approach in the budget, and I would therefore like to raise a few matters for your consideration.

The world has changed and today there are more actors than ever on the international stage dealing with the same matters as the ILO.

That means a situation of competition which did not exist too long ago and that puts additional requirements on the Organization and on us delegates. Rather than to rely on the fact that and repeat that the ILO, within the United Nations, has been given a specific mandate, etc., that the ILO is an august body, etc. or that the ILO has a certain pluralistic approach in its work, we should show that the ILO is the most relevant, the most competent and the most innovative of all actors regarding economic and social affairs.

Competition also means that the ILO in order to survive has always to be in the forefront regarding ideas and ways of implementing them. The ILO should strive to be the leading body on international economic, social and development matters, not because of formalities or history, but due to competence because that is the only thing that counts in the long run.

The ILO should therefore not only take time to look at its own work but also take stock of experience, opinions and research under way elsewhere in the academic and international communities in order to review the issues which are emerging and the new approaches which are developing.

Such a stock-taking exercise will also help us to examine our own work, to think about new ways of mobilizing the constituency of the ILO and even new constituencies which might be mobilized. It could raise the profile, explore new approaches and issues both in analyses and design of policy.

The whole United Nations system for technical cooperation is undergoing a radical change and is moving in a completely new direction from a few years ago.

How can the ILO cope with that challenge? Because it is a challenge – not a threat.

We know that one effect of the new direction is that the extrabudgetary resources devoted to the specialized agencies will be considerably reduced. Well, we then, of course, have to fight to get the market share we need and deserve.

And how do we obtain it?

First of all – perhaps a minor point, which however should not be totally disregarded – and that is the way project proposals are presented to donors. There is a clear tendency to magnify trifles, and by fluffy, wordy descriptions make a show of small projects being able to influence a lot of circumstances not directly related to the project.

Thereby the proposals become vague and difficult to grasp for potential donors. When the outer appearance has been removed, the rhetoric and ornaments discarded, even good and original ideas may be regarded as rather petty.

Donors do not necessarily request projects where the intended results can be quantified – but proposals have to be comprehensible and explicit. There is nothing more important than clarity!

But more essential than the presentation of project proposals is, of course, the whole approach to the problems we are dealing with.

There are expressions of objectives and priorities in the budget – but they are in reality so many and often so general that it is impossible to monitor performance. There are no indications of relatively low priorities or of resource requirements in the various programmes. Nor is there any discussion of the impact of extrabudgetary resources, except that there is a reduction of these sources and that this will have severe consequences.

What is needed is a more coherent and consistent budget with a much clearer presentation of what will be achieved during the next two years. There is also a strong need for more transparency to make it possible to monitor what is going on.

Such a development would raise the quality of debate and as a result also governance from the Governing Body and make it possible for the Governing Body to offer a substantive input to the work of the Organization.

What is said about poverty alleviation is, to my understanding too vague. Where is the vision? Where is the integrated and comprehensive ideas desperately needed to approach such a vast problem?

We know that the past decade has brought more degrading poverty, and in a changing world, the lives of the poor are static. In a world full of hope, they are fated to despair.

That refers in particular to women.

More often than not, life for rural women is still governed by necessity – the daily quest for food, water and fuel, and the ceaseless work in the fields and at home. The miseries endured by countless millions of rural women in the world remain. Poverty is the great oppressor bearing down on women's lives.

Across the world, young girls tend to be fed less, pulled out of school earlier, forced into hard labour sooner and given less medical care than boys. And as grown-ups they will find that bearing children is a routine function of their lives.

The present ILO approach to problems caused by poverty is difficult to characterize, but I think, if I may be somewhat provocative, that there is too much of a defensive orientation.

To my understanding, it is more important than ever for the ILO to focus on the underlying causes of labour and social problems and indeed poverty. Emphasis should be put on the relation between poverty and the structural and qualitative aspects of growth, and on the issue of how anti-poverty programmes can be conceived and made a primary policy objective of adjustment policies.

It is important to work out a comprehensive and integrated strategy – multidisciplinary strategy if you prefer to call it that – not only multidisciplinary teams, but a strategy where the hierarchy of priorities are clear and where there is balance and mutual support between different components of policy. Thereby changes in one area can be made to promote the interests of the poor by simultaneously introducing changes in other areas. Such an integrated approach, where various components reinforce each other, is to a great extent lacking.

It is often said that the ILO should cooperate with the Bretton Woods institutions and I fully agree to that. But in order to have an impact on other international bodies within or outside the United Nations, and to have an impact on the current debate on economic, social and poverty matters, it is essential to develop continuously new ideas and, through evaluation and research, make the old ones more solid. The ILO should, much more actively, participate in the debate on the causal links between stabilization and structural adjustment and poverty.

The "great plan" is dead and buried; "the magic idea" is difficult to come up with, but with a clear vision for the whole Office to centre on, a vision which is not only the lowest common denominator of the three groups but something that intellectually and practically challenges both governments, employers and workers. I am convinced that the ILO outside this room will be looked upon as THE leading actor on social and poverty matters. But prominence requires a lot of analytical effort, a lot of thinking and a lot of research. Policy advice has to be based on knowledge developed within the Organization – a knowledge that is constantly questioned by ourselves and constantly renewed and adapted to changing circumstances. The new complexities in this world call for more integration between research and technical cooperation.

I am aware of the risk of my observations being interpreted as negative, but they are not. My delegation appreciates what the ILO does and strongly supports the Organization. But nothing in this world is perfect and there is always room for improvement.

I am also convinced that with more of a coherent approach towards the roots of poverty, the ILO will be able to show solidarity with the poor nations and with the poorest of the poor – women, men and children.

So I do hope that during the next biennium the first steps towards such a visionary strategy will be taken and that we, some years from now, can look back to the 75th anniversary as the beginning of a very important era for the ILO.

Finally, there is no difference here between the ILO and any national or international company or organization. To keep the empire functioning efficiently and smoothly, make sure that your staff is of the highest possible quality, that there is a strong work ethic, constant communication and decisiveness and a management philosophy that rewards people for looking beyond their borders – those with imagination who dare take risks and question also the dogmas.

As always, we have to be humble in our attitudes but forceful in our efforts, and indeed we have to be obsessed with the idea of success!

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada) – I would like to add to the remarks I made this morning before discussing the programme and budget, by expressing our sincere thanks as workers to the Chairman of this Committee who has handled it so well for us, brother Vanni. We would like to thank him for his courage in being on this Committee on our behalf and for upholding the principles in which we believe so firmly.

On behalf of the Workers' group, I would like to fully support and commend the Programme and Budget proposals for the next biennium. In doing so, I would like to reiterate some of the major considerations of the Workers' group in our discussions of the proposed Programme and Budget.

We have to ensure that our Programme and Budget continues to reflect clearly and unambiguously the social mandate of the ILO within the United Nations family. And that means that we must see to it that the resources and programmes proposed for future ILO action should not be allowed to drift away from this basic concept and become confused with activities and objectives that are not of a specifically social nature, and therefore within the competence of other United Nations agencies.

The Workers' group is reasonably satisfied that the proposals before us adhere to that basic principle, although we will have to remain alert and self-critical in this regard.

The ILO is the only institution of its kind with a clear and explicit mandate to promote tripartism, internationally as well as nationally. In this context, we feel that the role to be given, as of the next biennium, to the new programme of active partnership and to the multi-disciplinary teams will be crucial.

We are therefore very pleased that the proposed budget will provide the resources needed for an adequate implementation of this new system, which is designed to promote effective tripartite participation in the ILO's work particularly in the field and in the regions. This is indeed of crucial importance to all of us in this Organization.

It was therefore essential to make sure that we take no half-measures in support of this new initiative in terms of the means required to give it a solid and successful start in the next biennium. Here again, the Workers' group is quite satisfied that the proposals before us go as far as they can, bearing in mind the severe budgetary constraints within which we will once again have to work during the next biennium.

This brings me to my third point. I would like to mention here that the Workers' group is certainly not alone in hoping fervently that a zero growth budget will never again be imposed on the ILO.

Together with working people all over the world, this Organization finds itself in a critical period of new challenges, increasing pressure and obligations and growing problems in the world of work. It simply does not make sense any more to believe that the ILO can continue to face these responsibilities, and to play and defend its unique role within the United Nations system, on the basis of successive zero-growth – successive-zero growth budgets biennium after biennium.

If we look at the figures, we will see that even the zero growth is not maintained, and that there is in reality a decrease in the resources available to this Organization to play its crucial role.

We appeal to the governments represented here and all the governments who are not represented here to pay their contribution to this Organization on time and in full. We realize that this is not the time and place to debate this issue, but we wanted to express our opinion that we cannot continue with zero growth as a principle, let alone a philosophy.

But having said this, Mr. President, on behalf of the Workers' group, we will support this fully and unanimously.

Original Russian: Mr. SLIPTCHENKO (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Ukraine) – I have asked for the floor to make a very short statement confirming the position of Ukraine with regard to its contribution for 1994. I won't repeat here all the arguments which we have already put forward on this topic in the Finance Committee. These are adequately reflected in Provisional Record No. 17 (paragraphs 11 and 15 of the third report). I would like to thank Mr. Chotard in his joint capacity as Chairman and Reporter and also the members of the secretariat who helped us in this.

On the basis of the arguments we have put forward, we are unfortunately unable to support the proposed scale of contributions for 1994, and if this proposal is put to the vote here today we shall vote against it.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move to the adoption of the second and third reports. The adoption of the second report entails the adoption of the summary of the discussions that took place in the Committee, contained in paragraphs 1 to 68, as well as the five resolutions which appear at the end of the report. Are there any objections? If not I shall consider that paragraphs 1 to 68 of the report are adopted.

(The second report, paragraphs 1 to 68, is adopted.)

Resolution concerning outstanding debts of member States and the right to vote

Report of the Standing Orders Committee: Submission, discussion and adoption

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Mircea, Government adviser, Romania; Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee.

Original French: Mr. MIRCEA (Government adviser, Romania, Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Standing Orders Committee. You will find this at the end of Provisional Record No. 11. It is brief, as was the work of the Committee, which had just one busy sitting on 3 June. The brevity of the meeting testifies to quality of the preparatory work done by the Governing Body Working Party, chaired by the distinguished Government representative of Canada, Mrs. Caron, during the course of three successive sittings, with the highly qualified assistance of the ILO Secretariat, particularly the Legal Adviser, Mr Maupain, and his colleagues.

That intensive work made it possible, following mutual concessions, to arrive at a set of solutions which enjoyed the unanimous support of all groups. It remained for the Standing Orders Committee only to verify whether the texts, carefully prepared by the Standing Orders Committee of the Governing Body, would make it possible to achieve their objectives in technical and legal terms.

I would like to conclude these introductory remarks by warmly thanking the Vice-Chairmen, Miss Hak, Employers' delegate from the Netherlands, and Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate from Pakistan, whose unstinting cooperation went far towards facilitating the Committee's work. The brevity of the report does not do justice to the considerable importance, the historic importance, of what it seeks to implement. So that the Conference will be fully aware of this report's scope, I should like to address its contents and place them in the context of the scheduled reforms of the Organization.

Notwithstanding the innumerable changes that have been made over time to the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Conference has remained almost unchanged since the outset. Invariably, the Conference began on a Wednesday, and lasted three weeks (or even longer, in the early days). Every session had the full range of committees, including the Selection Committee which met every day, as well as the Resolutions Committee.

This way of proceeding overlooked modern technical means which make it possible to conduct consultations without the need for physical presence of all the delegates, many of whom face time constraints owing to their responsibilities at the national level.

In this context, the idea was to shorten the Conference on the one hand, so as not to discourage high-level national officials from coming to the Conference and contributing their experience to lighten and rationalize the Conference, by concentrating its work on the essential points of the Organization's mandate, in other words its technical and standards-setting activities, eliminating other tasks, and particularly those that belong more properly with the Organization's administration.

As concerns the shortening of the Conference, the idea is, as you know, for each session to begin on Tuesday morning, at 11 a.m., and to end on Friday of the third week, followed immediately, on Saturday, by the post-Conference meeting of the Governing Body. This would mean a reduction of four days in comparison with the 1991, 1992 and 1993 Sessions, and of five days when compared with the traditional sessions of previous years. It is important to note that this reduction will not reduce the time available for the technical committees. This reform will not require a direct amendment of the Standing Orders and will therefore go into force as of the next session of the Conference, in 1994. It will certainly require much self-discipline on the part of delegates, and even more meticulous care in the preparations undertaken by the Office.

The Working Party emphasized the preparatory measures which will be necessary to ensure that this reduction in the length of the Conference will not jeopardize the quality of its work.

The second change concerns a lightening of the work of the Conference. There are two aspects to this. The first concerns the consolidation of the various reports which the Conference discusses in the plenary sittings. Under the present Standing Orders, the Conference has before it each year the report of the Director-General on the Organization's activities, the report of the Governing Body, and every two years, in the non-budgetary years, a report on programme implementation. It has become clear that these various reports to a large extent overlap, and that it would be much more rational and economical to have a single consolidated report in non-budgetary years, covering the whole range of the Organization's activities, the effect given to the Conference resolutions and the implementation of the programme over the past financial period.

There are two significant measures which complement this reform. First, the Chairman of the Governing Body will continue to present an oral report at the start of the general discussion every year. Secondly, and this is particularly to be emphasized, the Standing Orders Committee of the Governing Body has specified that even in the budgetary years, when there is no activities report before the Conference, the Conference will nevertheless continue to have before it all the reports which it has requested the Director-General to present on an annual basis.

That is, for example, the case of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Specifically, these various reforms entail amendments to article 11*bis*, to eliminate paragraphs 2 and 3 concerning the programme implementation report; to article 12, to replace the reference to the Reports of the Director-General and of the Governing Body with a reference to the new consolidated report; and to article 25, to take account of the fact that the Governing Body report will no longer be a written report, but an oral report.

The second change concerns the Resolutions Committee. The Working Party and the Governing Body agree that the Resolutions Committee should meet only once every two years, in non-budgetary years. This is a very important reform. Again, it is accompanied by two significant adjustments.

First of all, it is envisaged that in every other year, i.e. the budgetary years, the Conference will continue to accept resolutions of an urgent nature, as provided for in article 17(2) of the Standing Orders; it was agreed in the Working Party that the notion of urgency should be understood in the light of the new context.

Secondly, doing away with resolutions in budgetary years will be compensated by a strengthening of the standard-setting activities, since the Conference should ensure that the review of existing standards will replace the general discussions which, at present, are on its agenda. You will see on reading the report that the spokesman of the Workers emphasized in this regard the importance for them of this objective, and that the Canadian representative, Mrs. Caron, who chaired the Working Party, once again emphasized the importance of paragraph 13 of the report.

This reform requires a modification of article 17, paragraph 1, in order to make it clear that the resolutions will be receivable only in the non-budgetary years, or, in the terminology of the Standing Orders, on the occasion of a session preceding the beginning of a biennial financial period, and a modification of paragraph 2, in order to specify the conditions in which resolutions of an urgent nature will be dealt with in a budgetary year, as well as in non-budgetary years.

A minor amendment is made to paragraph 6 to specify the date by which the Standing Orders Committee must terminate its work, within the framework of the Conference's new timetable.

In conclusion, it might be worth emphasizing that this very substantial reform of the Conference does not end the projected reform of functioning of the Organization. As many of you already know, the Governing Body has decided to undertake its own major reform, entrusting it to the same person who has successfully led the reforms of the Conference. The reforms of the Governing Body will supplement and strengthen the reforms of the Conference itself.

One example of this synergy is that by moving up the date by which the Governing Body decides the Conference's agenda, the Office and the member States will have more time to undertake their preparatory work for the preparation of international labour standards, whose quality can thus be expected to improve.

Another example is the abolition of the May session of the Governing Body; this will be especially appreciated by delegates who are also Governing Body members, and who in the past have been discouraged by the prospect of spending five consecutive weeks in Geneva.

We may hope that the Organization, thus rejuvenated, will be better equipped to confront the formidable challenges facing it and to seize the major opportunities that the next century, which is so soon upon us, will offer.

In the light of these facts, which it seemed to me useful to mention as a background for the text that is now before you, we recommend that the Conference approve the amendments which appear in paragraph 14 of the report, as well as the note appearing in paragraph 15, concerning adjustments to the application of the Standing Orders to the Maritime Sessions of the International Labour Conference.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada) – I am going to say a few remarks to you, but before I do that I would like to say to you that our brother from the Workers' group, Brother Khurshid Ahmed, who is our spokesman, was called home very suddenly owing to a death in the family. On his behalf, I would like simply to indicate to you that the Workers' group supports the report of the Standing Orders Committee and, particularly, the fruitful discussion regarding the restructuring of the Conference which was held in the Governing Body and the conclusions thereafter. And we are very pleased with the way that this particular group worked together so well, with the confidence which prevailed between the three groups on the conclusions, and with how we were able to come to those conclusions and, obviously, also get them adopted.

We also are pleased to note that next year we will have the benefit of the new process and, as usual, we are going to beg everyone to make sure that they understand that it will be a process which may, for some, be difficult to adapt to. Nevertheless, we ask that you continue to keep the faith and we will try to proceed through this new process as quickly and as easily as possible.

The Workers' group happens to believe that, in fact, we are moving in the right direction but at the same time we express our reservations or concern that this should not be at the expense of the work or the objectives that we want to realize – that all of us want to realize – in this Conference. In our opinion, we will all have to work harder and make sure that we can complete our work on time within the new time-frame, and in particular with the assistance of electronic voting and a few other things that we were able to recommend. It is important that we should be able to complete our work. It is hoped that this work can be completed without too much disruption and, within that framework, we support the adoption of the Committee's report.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move to the adoption of paragraphs 1 to 13, and of the amendments to the Standing Orders proposed in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the report. Are there any comments on paragraphs 1 to 13? If not, I shall consider that paragraphs 1 to 13 of the report are adopted.

(Paragraphs 1 to 13 are adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the amendments to articles 11*bis*, 12, 17 and 25, proposed in paragraph 14, as well as the Note for Maritime Sessions of the Conference, which appears in paragraph 15 of the report, are adopted?

(The report and amendments are adopted.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I should like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and all the other members of the Committee on Standing Orders for their excellent work.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now move to the next item of the agenda, the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. M. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should first like to offer my warmest congratulations to His Excellency, Minister Abdel-Hak, on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and to tell him, on my own behalf and on behalf of my country's delegation, of the honour and pleasure that his elevation to that high office affords us as Arabs and Africans. We trust that his experience, skill and farsightedness will enable him to guide our proceedings to a successful conclusion.

I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his re-election as executive head of the International Labour Office and on the renewed confidence shown in him by the Members of the Organization. I wish him every success in his difficult and sensitive task.

The International Labour Organization is preparing to celebrate its 75th anniversary. We all have reason to be proud of this venerable international body and to commend its achievements, especially in respect of labour standards and technical cooperation, which have had a far-reaching impact on the development of human resources and of basic human rights.

Our Organization, which spearheaded the defence of these rights by establishing labour standards and setting up a machinery to monitor their observance, must take steps at this delicate juncture in its history to devise modern methods of technical cooperation that take into account the pressing needs of developing countries and the changes that have taken place in the world.

In this connection, we feel that many middle-income developing countries such as Tunisia are still very much in need of technical cooperation programmes that take into account progress made in strengthening democracy, social dialogue, social protection and the integration of groups that failed to reap the benefits of general growth. These are aims that our Organization has always sought to achieve.

We consider that the ILO has an important role to play in strengthening cooperation among developing countries in the social field, a policy unanimously endorsed by the non-aligned countries and adopted in the Tunis Declaration issued by the Fourth Conference of Ministers of Labour of the Non-Aligned Countries and in the declaration of the Jakarta summit, in which the countries concerned reaffirmed the need to boost the ILO's resources so that it can support cooperation among developing countries so that they can draw on the expertise available in those countries and on the experience of the countries of the South in alleviating the social consequences of economic pressures.

In this connection, the ILO, thanks to its rich experience and moral standing, is capable of proposing new forms of funding for technical cooperation or supporting initiatives that advance that aim, such as the proposal of the President of Tunisia concerning the rescheduling of debt and the use of the resources thus released to promote employment.

The need for effective economic policies and to modernize production techniques in order to meet the many challenges arising from the world economic situation has tended to have an adverse impact on social policy or to curb the ambitions of many countries to increase their living standards quickly.

To remedy this situation, the path of democracy must be followed in relations with the different social partners. In Tunisia, we have recently had a new round of collective bargaining on wages and conditions of work, as well as far-reaching consultations on a revision of the Labour Code. This has had the effect of strengthening social dialogue and promoting a climate of trust among the social partners themselves and between them and the Government. As a result, agreement has been reached on considerable salary increases over a three-year period and on changes in labour legislation with a view to protecting workers' acquired rights and at the same time consolidating the productive capacity of enterprises. Our aim in this is to promote convergence and interaction between social and economic policies in the interests of overall development.

We take pride in the fact that social protection is a priority policy of the Tunisian Government because we are convinced that we cannot constitute a civil society without solidarity among all groups and generations and without a fair distribution of the country's income and resources. I therefore take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for having chosen as the theme for this year's Report Social insurance and social protection, at a time when many countries, including Tunisia, are reviewing their social security schemes in order to adapt them to social and economic changes.

Since 7 November 1987, which marked a turning point in our country, Tunisia has been consolidating this trend, as witnessed by the increase in the number of members of the different social security schemes and the increase in social security expenditure, which accounts for 4.25 per cent of GDP. Major changes in this sector are expected under the eighth five-year plan (1992-96), for example an increase in effective social security coverage to 75 per cent in 1996, improvements in the sector's infrastructure and management techniques, promotion of decentralization and furtherance of the role of social security institutions in achieving national objectives, chief among which are the promotion of employment and attention to the needs of vulnerable groups and needy families.

These aims underlay President Ben Ali's initiative designed to ensure that mutual support and solidarity are given proper attention, inasmuch as the success of the development process depends on concerted action on the part of a people moved by solidarity and free from discrimination and marginalization.

The President has approved a national programme for needy families and the establishment of a national solidarity fund. He has called on all Tunisians to make voluntary contributions to help finance large-scale social projets designed to reduce poverty and narrow the social gaps between individuals and between regions.

During this session, the international community is addressing issues relating to the protection of mankind from the scourge of poverty and the many adverse consequences of the new international economic situation. We would like to draw attention to the tragedy of Palestinian workers, who are daily the victims of violations of their human rights. We wish to appeal to the conscience of the world in order to alert it to this dangerous situation, which shows every sign of continuing until such time as the international community takes a decisive stand on behalf of justice, legitimacy and human rights.

Unfortunately, the Palestinians are not the only people suffering in the world today. We all have a responsibility to work for the elimination of apartheid and likewise of the new phenomenon of ethnic cleansing of the Muslim people in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Our commitment to the ILO stems from our belief in its principles and Conventions, which defend human rights, human dignity and non-discrimination and seek to promote better working conditions and higher salaries consistent with respect for these basic rights.

We expect much from this distinguished Organization in terms of ensuring that the values of justice between nations and different social strata really prevail. In return, we reaffirm Tunisia's commitment to respect the Organization's instruments and to help it to cross the threshold of the twenty-first century as smoothly as possible.

(Mr. Tabani takes the Chair.)

Mr. ROZENDAL (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs for the Netherlands Antilles, Netherlands) – Allow me first of all to join the preceding speakers in expressing to the President, and to the other officers of the Conference, my most sincere congratulations on their election at this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under their able leadership our work will be crowned with success and we will attain all the objectives we have set ourselves.

I should, before going any further, give credit to the Director-General and his fine staff for the clarity of his thought-provoking Report entitled Social insurance and social protection.

The Report in its entirety is instructive, offering us a sound overview of the main features of the social security schemes, their objectives and constraints. The Director-General reminds us in his Report that access to social protection is a basic human right, as well as a measure of human welfare.

The Government of the Netherlands Antilles, which is a non-metropolitan territory of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, fully realizes the importance of this observation.

It is a sure sign of good governance to extend coverage of social security and health care programmes to the workers, and the population segments who need it the most.

In fact, the social security bank of the Netherlands Antilles is now in the process of being reorganized in order to be able to operate even more efficiently, both as to the payment of the benefits and the collection of social insurance contributions.

This session of the International Labour Conference once again has a very important agenda. Two issues in particular have captured the attention of the Government of the Netherlands Antilles.

Firstly, we are interested in the item concerning part-time work. As of last year, the Government of the Netherlands Antilles started to explore the possibilities of promoting part-time work, and removing the barriers to it. Our labour policy is geared towards encouraging flexibility on the labour market, and creating equal job opportunities for men and women alike. Women in particular can benefit from expanding opportunities for part-time work.

I also feel that flexibility in the work schedule might lead to a more efficient allocation of human resources. For the workers it might mean a better allocation of working time and help combine employment with family obligations.

To the Netherlands Antilles, formalization of part-time work is a new concept, and an international instrument on part-time work might give us some valuable guidelines on adjusting our national legislation.

The second important issue for us is the prevention of industrial disasters, now in its second discussion. As the production, storage and use of hazardous substances has increased globally, the potential for major industrial accidents has become more significant. Even on our relatively unspoilt sunny Caribbean islands we have industrial installations, which might create hazardous situations not only for the workers concerned, but also for the population living in the vicinity of the installations. Let me mention, by way of example, the giant oil refinery on the island of Curacão. It is fortunate that the management of this refinery is very mindful of safety aspects and strict in imposing its safety rules and regulations, making the installation one of the safest of its kind in the world.

In my capacity as Minister of Labour and Social Affairs for the Netherlands Antilles, I would like to refer to some aspects of our labour policy in relation to the ILO.

After a long period of economic depression in the mid-1980s, the Netherlands Antilles are now experiencing a relatively positive economic development. Events on the labour market reflect this trend, with a decrease of unemployment and an increase of new jobs. Nevertheless, youth unemployment remains unacceptably high. The Government, trade, industry and the trade unions together must address this problem by making a concerted policy effort in, for instance, the fields of education and vocational training for young unemployed persons. Also, there even seems to be an increasing shortage of skilled labour in certain specialized areas.

For dealing with our labour market, the Government of the Netherlands Antilles adheres to the ILO principle of tripartism and shared responsibility in this matter. As early as 1966 a socio-economic council was installed on a tripartite basis on the Netherlands Antilles with the aim of advising the Government in its socio-economic policy. Over the years, the socio-economic council has proved to be a valuable partner in policy-making.

In fact, last month another consultative body was established in Curacão, the so called "Foundation of labour". This in essence is a bipartite body consisting of employers' and workers' representatives with the goal of promoting dialogue between workers and employers on labour issues, coordinating their viewpoints and finding common ground. The Government of the Netherlands Antilles welcomes the contributions of this new forum.

This year promises to be one of the most important years in the history of our country and, in a way, may well mark a dramatic change in the constitutional situation of the Netherlands Antilles. Several islands of the Dutch Caribbean, namely Curacão and Saint Martin, are trying to become autonomous entities within the structure of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, just like Aruba did several years ago.

Shortly, top-level talks of the Kingdom partners will resume on the island of Curacão, laying the actual framework for a new constitutional constellation of the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

The "trade winds" of change will be blowing in the Netherlands Antilles and will possibly be blowing the five islands of this country on their own separate courses.

"Change" is definitely the operative word for the Netherlands Antilles in the year 1993. I should like to conclude by expressing our commitment to the ILO and assure you that its principles will nevertheless not be subject to change.

Original Portuguese: Mr. DA COSTA NETO (Minister of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security, Angola) – Allow me, first of all, to express, on behalf of the Government of Angola, the delegation accompanying me, and in my own name, our best wishes to the President on his election to chair this session and for its successful conclusion at a time in which the world is proceeding towards democratization.

Allow me as well to repeat my heartfelt satisfaction at this time for the relevance and profound nature of the subject proposed to us for discussion. Angola did not inherit from its colonial past any real experience in the field of social protection for there was no social security system covering all the workers of our country.

The social security system that we have established is a young one. It was introduced with the support of ILO experts, and in January 1992 we began to identify contributors and beneficiaries.

Within the framework of ILO technical cooperation, we must emphasize the collaboration and technical assistance in the field of social security offered by the Organization to our Ministry in close collaboration with the Angolan Government, which has led to the creation of the necessary conditions starting the social security system in our country.

The administration of social security is a complex matter. We do not have enough capable managers to cover our vast country which, when peace is achieved, will require a decentralization of services. We believe that this cooperation effort should continue so that our Social Security Institute can fully consolidate its management capacities.

As to the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, the ILO must identify the problems of member countries with a view to accomplishing projects with a social and economic impact, while avoiding the scattering of resources and duplication of tasks.

The promotion of employment and the development of human resources must be at the centre of the ILO's concerns, in particular in the context of economic difficulties and structural adjustment measures.

Support must be given to public and private organizations which may, through the achievement of their activities, facilitate job creation. Assistance must be provided in vitalizing programmes which contribute to the technical development of placement centres in line with market needs and possibilities. Vocational training activities must be constantly developed and strengthened. These then are the enormous tasks that countries such as mine propose and feel it possible to achieve with the assistance of the ILO in the near future.

I believe that you are aware of the fact that Angola is experiencing one of the most tragic periods of its history. It is with great consternation and indignation that we see that the situation has come about because for the first time we have conducted free and fair elections in my country, elections which represented for most Angolans the starting point at last towards a future of peace, employment, development and prosperity. However, this dream has not yet become a reality.

Reality in Angola today is unfortunately one of war, hatred, brutality and cruelty. A war which has been engendered by a political military organization which, having lost those elections, which the United Nations considered to be free and just, and in which it agreed to participate freely, has lost sight of the most elementary principles of human civilization and democracy.

More than 344,000 persons have been displaced as a result of the war; there have been thousands of persons directly affected by military combat and drought. More than 30 per cent of the country's city districts have been destroyed and nearly 100,000 persons have died, in addition to extensive destruction of our economic, social and administrative infrastructure. All this has occurred in just eight months. All this has occurred because a political military organization has not accepted the results of multiparty elections that were internationally observed under the supervision of the United Nations, which declared them to be free and just. This is the work of a political military organization which was defeated in the elections of 29 and 30 September 1992. I am speaking of UNITA.

Against such a backdrop, it is not difficult to imagine the real situation which exists in Angola as regards the labour market, vocational training and social security in particular.

From the little which I have described to you, you can appreciate how much the legitimate Government of Angola needs the support and solidarity of each and every Government and institution which you represent. In particular, we appeal here and now to the ILO for the financing and implementation of projects in the sphere of labour administration, the reduction of social suffering and the technical and vocational training of Angolan workers.

The vocational rehabilitation of the disabled, especially as a result of the war, the vocational training of thousands of young persons who want to get a first job even though they have no basic qualifications, the organization and establishment of measures in the sphere of employment policy, the development and extension of social security infrastructure, health protection and job security. All these objectives are essential in my country if we are to avoid a tragic extension of the social disaster brought about by the war in almost all domains of Angolan society. Even the application by my country of many international labour Conventions and resolutions is made practically impossible by the war which UNITA continues to wage.

Today, as never before, the life and dignity of the workers and employers are facing the enormous danger that the values and interests which are universally recognized in the world of work will be totally destroyed.

Help us to save democracy and freedom in Angola.

Original French: Mr. NDASINGWA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Rwanda) – The 80th Session of the International Labour Conference gives me the opportunity to speak on behalf of my country before this august gathering, and to pass on to the ILO the cordial greetings of the Rwandan people. My country's presence here testifies to its confidence in this Organization, and also provides an opportunity for us to learn from the extensive experience of the other countries represented here in the sphere of employment and social protection of workers.

Before I go on, I would like to extend to the President and the other Officers our congratulations on his election to guide the discussions of this session of Conference. I would also like to take the opportunity to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his re-election. I can assure the President that the Rwandan delegation will cooperate unstintingly in order to contribute to the full success of his work.

I have come to the Conference from Arusha in the United Republic of Tanzania, where I was a member of the Rwandan delegation involved in political negotiations seeking to end the Rwandan conflict.

As you may know, Rwanda has for almost three years been in the throes of a civil war whose origins can be traced back among other things to the problem of the Rwandan refugees. They have been refugees longer than almost anyone else on the continent, and attacked their country to demand a share in power, the establishment of a constitutional State, and a democratic political system. For almost a year, the parties to the dispute have been aware of the need to resolve this fratricidal war through political negotiation. Real progress has been made to the point where, when I left Arusha, the final touches were being made to a peace agreement, which would offer real hope to the Rwandan people and enable them to embark on a better future.

This war has been fought at enormous cost, in terms both of human life and of considerable material loss. Our meagre resources have been swallowed up, resources which could have been devoted to education, health care and other social services. One million people, almost one Rwandan out of seven, have been displaced by the war. And this is not to speak of the loss of jobs resulting from the cessation or slowing down of economic activity in a number of sectors. It goes without saying that the general insecurity has damaged any prospect of new investment.

The peace agreement was negotiated in the presence of the international community, and I would venture here to mention a number of countries and organizations which have helped us from the outset. They include Burundi, Belgium, France, Germany and the United States, and international organizations such as the United Nations and the OAU. The peace agreement requires the support of the international community to keep it alive and implement it. It will require a genuine Marshall Plan for Rwanda for reconstruction and for the social and economic integration of its demobilized soldiers, for whom civilian jobs will have to be found. We also have to contend with the return of refugees, which will necessitate a huge infrastructure programme, as well as occupational training and job-creation.

Under these war conditions, it is obvious that poverty increases and the ordinary worker is always hardest hit. To deal with the economic crisis brought on by the fall in prices of its exports and to re-start our economy, Rwanda has adopted a programme of structural adjustment following negotiations with the Bretton Woods Institution. Everyone is aware of the harsh nature of such programmes, whose benefits may unfortunately not be felt for many years.

In this context and in order to mitigate the negative effects of the structural adjustment programme, Rwanda has begun to set up a national social assistance programme, one of the most important aspects of which is the creation of remunerated employment in rural areas through labour-intensive projects. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the International Labour Office for its contribution to the creation of non-agricultural employment in rural areas. This effort must be continued, in particular with a view to promoting the informal sector and cottage industries which have the potential to create employment. In this way, Rwanda, supported by your Organization can see how necessary it is to draw up a comprehensive policy to promote employment to end unemployment among young persons who account for 60 per cent of the economically active population. Given its lack of natural resources, Rwanda is capitalizing on the development of human resources and we welcome the fact that the promotion of employment and the optimum use of human resources remain one of the ILO's major concerns, in particular at a time of serious economic difficulties and structural adjustment measures, as mentioned in the Director-General's excellent Report The role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

With regard to the Director-General's Report Social insurance and social protection I would like to point out that social security legislation in Rwanda, in accordance with international social security standards, covers pensions, including old-age, disability and survivor's pensions, benefits in the event of industrial injuries and maternity allowances.

However, due to our level of economic development, some areas, such as unemployment benefit, have not yet been dealt with. In addition, the social security system in Rwanda only covers wage-earners.

Nevertheless, we are about to set up a health care insurance system for wage-earners. Assistance in this project has been provided by the ILO in terms of the project's design, and feasibility studies.

In conclusion, I would like to say that Rwanda remains deeply attached to the Organization, has ratified most of the Conventions concerning fundamental human rights and has institutionalized tripartism which encourages dialogue within labour relations. Given the difficult situation facing my country, as I mentioned at the beginning of my speech, I feel I must sign off by repeating my appeal for international solidarity and cooperation and I call upon you to convey this appeal to your countries and respective organizations. I could not end without paying tribute to the efforts being made to introduce democracy and abolish apartheid in South Africa, which promises a brighter future for the continent and for humanity in general.

Original French: Mrs. CELESTIN SAUREL (Minister of Social Affairs, Haiti) – The delegation of Haiti would like to join previous delegations and address, on behalf of the legitimate Government of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, and in its own name, congratulations to the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that the experience and expertise which he has shown in guiding our debates will lead us to a successful conclusion.

My delegation also extends its congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, not only on his well-deserved re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO, but for his excellent Report to this session. And to conclude this brief introduction, we should also like to welcome the new States Members of the ILO.

The subjects covered by the Director-General's Report, social insurance and social protection and the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, have been studied very carefully by my Government.

The establishment of a new world order, far from achieving the expected results, has brought with it a rather gloomy outlook. If this new order has been marked on the one hand by the end of the cold war, it has on the other given rise to serious crises, which have had regrettable consequences on the social security and protection systems of many countries, in particular the least advanced ones.

The technological gap between the North and the South and the application of structural adjustment policies, the first effects of which have been a reduction in social expenditure, are all obstacles to a universal expression of the rules of social security and protection.

As the Director-General has rightly emphasized, social protection, seen as one of the basic human rights, requires sustained socio-economic growth, which can be obtained only through the establishment of a State based on the rule of law and in which all human rights are taken into account.

The range of social contingencies set forth in Convention No. 102 and the main labour standards which have resulted from that text allow us to realize the weaknesses of our social security and protection system. In Haiti, we have three public social security institutions: the Office of Occupational Accidents, Diseases and Maternity (OFATMA), the National Office of Old Age Insurance (ONA) and the Public Enterprise for Social Promotion and Housing (EPPLS). There is also a Welfare Institute and a Social Assistance Fund. Legally speaking, this system covers workers in the private sector. Public officials for their part receive a retirement pension only after 25 years of service.

Up until 7 February 1991, date of the investiture of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, our social security system did not fulfil its true vocation. The description given by the Director-General in his Report of social security bodies in the countries of the Third World coincides with the analysis made by my Government during this period between February-September 1991, and which pointed to unhealthy management, the absence of any structures to guarantee financing on the basis of distribution, the absence of any machinery to guarantee the indexation of benefits in line with the cost of living and the practice of illicit gain.

This is very briefly the situation which my Government inherited.

In such a situation, we had a veritable challenge before us, namely the duty of establishing social justice in the country and thereby contributing to the harmonization of social relations.

You will agree with me that the seven months of my Government were not sufficient to resolve these problems which, far from being transitory and economic, are of a structural kind.

However, many efforts were made to overcome these social evils. Thus the ministry which I head had set up committees to restructure the bodies which I have mentioned. The first measures consisted of their reorganization. In fact, salaries of officials absorbed some 75 per cent of the operating budgets and it was essential to reduce administrative and operating costs to a minimum so as to protect the long-term results of the management of funds. The main concern of my Government in this sphere is to establish a new social security policy based on fair distribution.

During our seven months in power, we requested technical cooperation from the ILO to help us tackle the difficulties which faced us and to achieve our goal – socio-economic change.

These measures may at first glance seem acceptable. However they conflicted with the interests of the economically powerful classes which are always hostile to even minor changes aimed at achieving a more efficient distribution of national wealth. Social and economic inequality in Haiti is deep-rooted. Mr. Kearney, the representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation on 4 July said that during the 1980s, Haiti had become the third largest exporter of ready-made clothes to the United States, Central America and the Caribbean, with a 14 per cent annual increase in exports. However, wages in the best enterprises in the clothing industry amounted to US$1.11 per day. After a working day of nine hours a worker would be left with a mere 37 centimes in his pocket, having spent 44 centimes on travel and 32 centimes on food. It was hardly surprising that most families depended on bread and the water from sugar cane for nourishment.

The rich, the allies of the corrupt military whose expenditure accounts for 40 per cent of the national budget, have put an end to our first democratic experiment by toppling President Aristide in a bloody coup which left more than 3,500 people dead and hundreds of thousands of displaced persons, refugees and unemployed.

It goes without saying that the reforms started by my Government have been swept aside. The social conditions of workers and vulnerable sectors of the population have declined considerably during the 20 months of repressive government. The fact that the people of Haiti have been taken hostage by a handful of men and that 5 per cent of the population enjoy more than 90 per cent of national income mean that citizens are far from willing to cooperate and cooperation is the basis of social protection.

The social security and social protection system of a country is often an indication of the way in which national income is distributed, which in addition, also depends on the nature of the political regime. The way in which we govern can inspire the necessary confidence in social arrangements, according to the Director-General in his Report. This other way of governing had been followed by my Government whose policies were based on the principles of justice, transparency and participation.

In conclusion, the prospects, even after the reinstatement of the legitimate president, are gloomy, due to the reasons I have just mentioned. The priority of my Government, once returned to power, will be to restore social justice in the country. When implementing its programme aimed at restoring social justice, my Government will urgently need the ILO's technical support. The people of Haiti, despite some setbacks, have never surrendered, and wants to rebuild its country and ensure a prosperous future for the future generation. It is also hoping for support from the international community and help in overcoming certain obstacles which are sapping its energy.

Original Spanish: Mr. ROSALES ARGUELLO (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) – It is a great honour for me to have this opportunity to address this august assembly on the occasion of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. In particular, I should like to extend my congratulations to the President on his well-deserved election.

We could make a number of observations and comments about the Director-General's Report. We fully share its historical and sociological analysis of social insurance and social protection as well as the pertinent questions and points of criticism which it raised.

Account must be taken of the realities of the developing countries and in particular, those of Nicaragua where are emerging from a centralized economy and totalitarian-style State towards a free social market economy in which we are applying a structural adjustment and economic stabilization plan.

We have faith in this plan and have already been able to reduce our hyperinflation to zero and then to single-digit figures.

The objectives proposed by the Director-General are practically impossible to achieve and belong to the realms of utopia. They may be considered as final and ultimate objectives, although even these objectives too would have to be amended on the way to our final goal.

As regards the development and consolidation of social insurance and social protection schemes, we fully agree that this is a fundamental objective to be pursued by all developing countries.

Our social security scheme began in 1955 and because of the level of our social and economic development, it did not cover all socio-occupational categories or all the population, although it did allow our workers and their families to obtain protection against some of the contingencies of life, such as illness and maternity, disability, old age, death, as well as in respect of occupational hazards.

Even so, these benefits were limited in content and duration. In order to function properly, the social security system was financed on a tripartite basis with contributions from employers, workers and the State, which also subsidized in general war pensions, widows' pension and orphans' pensions within the framework of its social assistance policy. However, the old popular refrain about "the older you get, the poorer you get" was very true and even today it has not lost all its validity.

On 1 March 1982 the Sandinista regime promulgated Decree No. 974 which is the Social Security Act currently in force. The great innovation of this text was that the provision of medical care of all insured persons and its extension to the entire population was transferred to the Ministry of Health, through the institutionalization of a Single Health System. Social security became a fund which received contributions and which administered the schemes in respect of disability, old age and death benefits and as regards occupational hazards. Once again the Sandinista system, in a distortion of reality, lapsed into an error which had very dramatic consequences for the economically active population, because instead of receiving a bad service, it was left with practically none at all. It was possible to consult a doctor, but the lack of resources meant that there was no appropriate medication or auxiliary diagnostic services. Due to the war, hospital infrastructure and human resources were therefore very deficient, pension benefits had little relationship with the real cost of living and their purchasing power was to all intents and purposes below that of the minimum wage.

In summary, from a system in which benefits were granted on the basis of contributions and individual participation we moved to a system where services became generalized and where human rights predominated over individual capacity. This is not necessarily the best system for Nicaragua, because the economic and productive structure of the country is not in a position to bear the costs of such a system. Such schemes may be valid in developed or highly industrialized countries, but not in Nicaragua, which went from producing a thousand million dollars in exports to 227 million in 1989. Given the lack of national and foreign investment, we have not been able to overcome this situation.

As regards the extension of coverage to all the population, in principle this is unquestionably valid, provided that the extension is gradual and account is take of the social and economic development of the country. However, the lack of coherence between the economic recipes of the international financial institutions and the bodies responsible for national economic and social policy makes it difficult to extend such generalized coverage to all the population. Policies must therefore be defined collectively with the bodies responsible for social affairs and with the social partners. Tripartism and consensus must be the bases of strategies for overcoming the problems resulting from adjustment and economic stabilization policies.

The ILO should cease being a body which identifies social problems and prepares social programmes to offset the consequences of these economic policies and become an institution which implements social programmes, that is to say, which acquires the means to help meet the needs faced by the developing countries as a result of their structural adjustment and economic stabilization policies. These policies, the original objective of which was to re-establish the macro-economic balance and eliminate the financial and fiscal deficit, have led to a reduction in public expenditure and deterioration in the purchasing power of ordinary citizens. In the same way, the deregulation of the economy has freed prices, which has further compounded the drop in the purchasing power of wages. We have tried to keep basic food prices stable by virtual state intervention in the marketing of such products.

The modernization of the State has necessarily resulted in a reduction of state machinery, and thus increased unemployment and the growth of the informal sector.

Our army was reduced from 92,000 to 17,200 persons in three years and the central Government staff from 79,000 to 60,000. Most of those who became unemployed have not been able, because of our lack of a versatile vocational training and retraining scheme, to become integrated into work elsewhere. This makes the challenge even more difficult and profound. Adjustment policies make provision for a reduction in expenditure, but the international financial institutions forget that such expenditure is not simply expenditure, but a social investment, since the better trained the economically active population is, the more income there will be to redistribute.

With regard to the aim of formulating a set of guiding principles to ensure social protection based on needs and human rights rather than on ability to pay or to participate, if we look at political theory we cannot be surprised when individuals call on the State to meet their needs. Suffice it to quote one of the principles of socialism – "to each according to his needs", which in the meantime has become "to each according to his capacity". For developing countries, especially in the Third World, this is an extremely difficult task in view of their low level of economic development. The ideal of universality must therefore be tempered by the need for gradualism. We feel that in legal and standard-setting terms the guiding principles may certainly be formulated and viewed as an aspiration or ideal. Although economic prosperity and full employment are clearly not a sine qua non, the expansion of social protection and social expenditure on its development are just as clearly impeded by economic exigencies. Success if possible if we manage to strike a balance between economic adjustment policies and social protection policies.

Social protection policies in underdeveloped countries, particularly in Nicaragua, must be directed towards the implementation of programmes designed primarily to minimize extreme poverty and to prevent the "proletarianization" of professionals and the pauperization of the proletariat. I therefore feel that any global strategy against poverty should seek: (1) to create productive and long-term job opportunities; (2) to formulate a permanent national vocational training policy based on dual education; (3) to formulate a social protection policy for persons in the informal sector who are without a fixed income; (4) to formulate an employment promotion policy on behalf of young people in the 16 to 25 age group with employer and state involvement; (5) to draw up a training and further training programme for entrepreneurs; and (6) to promote economic and social consultations and dialogue as factors conducive to participation and social solidarity.

Lastly, I wish to state that I share the view that we need a broad vision that fosters social convergence between social protection programmes and policies relating to the labour market, economic objectives and the development of democracy.

Original Portuguese: Mr. BACAI SANHA (Government delegate, Guinea-Bissau) – It is a great pleasure for me to participate in the work of the International Labour Conference and I would like to avail myself of this happy opportunity, on behalf of my delegation and on my own personal behalf, to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the presidency of the Conference, an election which signifies recognition of the outstanding qualities he has demonstrated throughout his brilliant career. My congratulations go also to the Vice-Presidents of the Conference.

The matters addressed in the Director-General's Report eloquently reflect the common concerns of a citizen of one of the poorest countries of the world, and of a member of a Government which is strongly committed to giving effect to a policy of reform aimed at fully assuming responsibility for gradually meeting the economic, social and cultural needs of its citizens – the central concern of any modern, free, progressive and democratic State at this end of the twentieth century.

We warmly applaud the work done by the Director-General, and reiterate to him our confidence for the active, well-balanced and continuous attention he is giving to the problems of humanity, so full of contradictions and imbalances.

We highly appreciate his work on behalf of the least developed countries, particularly in Africa, and we hope that he will continue the fight which is also our own.

It should be emphasized that the Director-General's Report is rich in content and in lessons, and contains questions which are or should be a source of concern for all delegates here, matters addressed with great acuity and a rare sensibility; it remains for us only to recommend that this august assembly approve the Report.

It is obvious that the problems associated with freedom of association, equality of rights, employment, the development of enterprises and cooperatives, and vocational training continue to be an overriding concern of all countries represented in this assembly, be they rich, poor, developed or developing or among the least developed.

As concerns technical cooperation, we recognize that it is desirable and serves as an indispensable guide, for we recognize that the road to be travelled is still long and the efforts made for other solutions are significant.

However, we think that the ILO should continue to develop its action on behalf of the least developed countries in terms of technical cooperation.

I would like to inform this great assembly that my country is resolutely adopting measures of structural adjustment aimed at the rehabilitation of our economy. Our economic strategy inevitably involves economic liberalization and a redefinition of the role of the State in the productive sphere as an economic agent.

Clearly, this is the pattern in almost all the world's countries which have been obliged to choose this path, the path of structural adjustment; the consequences of that option are long in arriving.

Thus, our country is now facing difficult social problems owing to a grave economic crisis, notwithstanding the Government's efforts. State revenues have declined sharply, above all because our imports are running at a lower than normal level. In terms of the civil service, wages are now in arrears.

What is the justification for this sombre picture which we have just described? The Government of my country has long sought to discharge its obligations towards its partners, particularly the World Bank and the IMF: this has required the adoption of extremely restrictive measures which have negative social consequences.

However, for over two years now the country has been going through a structural adjustment programme without any external compensation, particularly from the World Bank and the IMF. We are now seeing the results in the labour sector, and particularly in the public service, where demands are leading to strikes.

How can we find a solution to these problems? That remains an unknown.

Although confronted with a number of social problems and engaged in the pursuit of measures of economic rehabilitation, we are reducing the size of our civil service, not only to reduce public expenditure, but also to motivate those who remain in that service.

Against this background we think that since the ILO is a body devoted to dialogue, consensus and the promotion of cooperation between employers and workers, it is naturally the international cooperation structure best equipped to help us create cooperatives and small enterprises, and to set up a training and retraining programme for government employees facing redundancy.

In 1992 over 1,000 government employees were made redundant, and a similar number are likely to be dismissed this year. It is solving the problems of these workers that is of concern to us, and we ask the ILO and other organizations for their assistance.

We would like to inform this great assembly that the delay in our Government's ratification of a number of international Conventions is due to our recent economic difficulties; however, a package of Conventions is now before the competent authorities and we look forward to its ratification this year.

It should be stressed here that freedom of association is a reality in my country, particularly as of October 1991, when the legislation concerning freedom of association and the right to strike were approved. We may mention the existence of a number of autonomous trade unions outside the central trade union, such as SINAPROF.

In a parallel development, we may also point to the fact that employers also are in the process of organizing. The Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture and Industry, has recently elected its officers democratically.

In the final analysis, this means that the question of tripartism is now fully assured in Guinea-Bissau.

Finally, we would like to communicate to this great assembly that, as a consequence of economic liberalization, our country is now undergoing far-reaching political and social changes. From 1991 to date, there are ten legal political parties, not counting the PAIGC, the party in power.

The first multi-party elections are to take place this year. A National Electoral Commission has been set up for that purpose, a body which will be responsible for technical preparation and the conduct of the elections.

The PAIGC and the Government will do everything possible to ensure that this historic event becomes a reality as early as possible, counting of course on the cooperation of all political parties and the support of the international community.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – I would be failing if in the first instance I did not congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. Likewise, I also would be failing if I did not commend the Director-General of the International Labour Office for the very interesting report he has presented us with, the first part of which deals with developments regarding social security and social protection systems in ILO member countries.

In this important field of social security and protection, different countries have different problems. We in Malta also have our particular problems and for us the Director-General's Report came at a very opportune moment because over the past months we have been engaged, and are still engaged, in a national debate on the future of our social security and social services and, much more so, over the future of our state-run national pension scheme.

This scheme guarantees each and every worker, in both the public and private sectors, a pension amounting to two-thirds of the relative wage of the post he or she holds upon retiring at the age of 61 if a male and 60 if a female. The pension is then adjusted annually to be kept in relation to the current wage obtaining in the post from which that worker retired.

As is the case in Europe and other developed countries, Malta is experiencing two demographic phenomena: an ageing population which is growing at a steady pace, and an increasingly lower birth rate. These two factors will bring a radical change in the age profile of the Maltese population over the next 20 to 30 years.

It is estimated that at present there are approximately 3.7 workers to support each pensioner with their social security contributions, which amount to one-twelfth of their wages, and which contributions are matched by contributions from government and employers in respect of every worker employed. By the year 2020 there will be some 2.2 workers for every pensioner if the female participation rate in the workforce does not increase from the present low rate of 26 per cent.

On paper, and I stress on paper, we already have a welfare gap. In fact, the Government's accounts books show that the welfare gap, which in 1987 stood at a mere 18.6 million Maltese liri, is estimated to shoot up to 54.6 million by this year's end.

In view of this the Government is saying that we have a pensions time bomb and that within a few years we are not going to have enough money for pensions. To underline the seriousness of this situation, in this year's budget the Government raised the employers' social security contribution from 8.33 to 10 per cent of the wage of every worker in their employ.

At the same time, the Government put forward a number of proposals which are now being discussed by representatives of the three social partners sitting on a welfare gap committee set up within the ambit of the tripartite Malta Council for Economic Development.

These government proposals include the gradual raising of the retirement age to 65 for both males and females; increases in workers' contributions; and not adjusting pensions every year by, for example, adding to them two-thirds of every wage increase granted to workers to offset cost-of-living rises.

The two Maltese trade union centres, that is my union, the General Workers' Union, and the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions, cannot accept such proposals. Also, we cannot accept nor tolerate that the Government should circumvent the welfare gap committee and arbitrarily resort to certain measures while the whole issue is still being discussed by the said committee.

For example, we cannot tolerate whirlwind decisions by the Government such as a premature decision according to which the retirement age of female workers is to be raised from 60 to 61 from next July.

While the welfare gap committee is still considering the issue, we cannot tolerate that the Social Security Department should start cutting down on pensions by not granting all pensioners a full rise in pensions amounting to two-thirds of a one Maltese lira per week cost-of-living increase which came into effect from the beginning of the year. The increase in all pensions should have been 66 cents per week but there were pensioners who received 53 and others even 35 cents.

This has created an anomaly to be added to another anomaly which is that from next year all present and future government and parastatal corporation pensioners are not going to be eligible for two-thirds of wage increments resulting from a new pay structure.

All this means that the principle of a two-thirds pension has been thrown overboard by our Government. Over and over again we have called upon the Government to take remedial measures and eliminate these inexplicable anomalies. If it does not, my union, the General Workers' Union, will have to reconsider its representation on the welfare gap committee.

We feel that this committee cannot come to the right conclusions on the future of pensions if the Government, in the first place, does not put the whole house in order. It is then that the committee could, for example, decide whether we really have a welfare gap or not, and if we do have this gap, then it could draw up corrective plans without causing unnecessary harm to present and future pensioners.

One of the immediate measures the Government should take is to make all employers forward to the public exchequer in good time all the contributions they deduct from their workers' wages together with the contributions they, as employers, are obliged to pay in respect of every worker employed. It is scandalous, to say the least, that millions of liri are owed to the Government in this way.

Another measure the Government should take is that in its national accounts books it should separate pensions and other contributory social security items from those items which are non-contributory social services and benefits and which in themselves represent social obligations undertaken by the State.

In certain quarters it is estimated that if there is separation between contributory and non-contributory items, there will not be a welfare gap of 54.6 million Maltese liri this year but a welfare credit of 27.5 million liri.

As regards the Government's proposal to raise the retirement age to 65, we feel this measure would not be in the interest of workers, especially those employed in manual work or on very hectic and demanding production lines. Many private sector employers have lately been complaining to my union that even at age 55 many workers do not remain as productive as they were when they were younger.

Raising the retirement age also goes against the interests of the young because they will have to wait longer to get a job or to get promoted, if they already are in a job.

Our Government seems to be in a state of panic and is telling us that a solution to the welfare gap is urgent and that if this solution is found today it would be better than tomorrow. But this matter needs to be examined deeply, with caution and with a clear mind. What we undo today will also be undone for future generations.

Original Russian: Mr. KUNYAVSKY (Employers' delegate, Belarus) – May I first of all sincerely congratulate the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference and his Vice-Presidents and members of the Office on their unanimous election to their posts. We are absolutely confident that the President's solid professionalism and his organizational skills will enable us to solve the problems facing the Conference.

I am also authorized by my country's employers' organizations to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election to a new term as Director-General of the ILO. Mr. Hansenne is well known in Belarus, and we greatly appreciate his services to the world community.

We are pleased by the Director-General's Report, both in its coverage of the problems of special insurance and social protection and of the ILO's activities in 1992.

In the first Report, we have been given a fairly full and very systematic elucidation of the problems of social insurance and social protection, which takes account of historical developments and the regional characteristics of this phenomenon. We are particularly sympathetic to Mr. Hansenne's argument that the scope and strength of social protection are determined by economic growth, and at the same time that protection is a major factor in the dynamics of economic development. We also endorse those parts of the Report which describe the characteristics of social protection in the countries of central and eastern Europe.

The Director-General's second Report confirms that the ILO in 1992 consistently fulfilled its statutory obligations and assisted the course of progress in the world community.

The problem of social protection is a very pressing one for my country, where the wounds of the Second World War have not fully healed where the harmful contamination which resulted from the Chernobyl accident has been a major factor, and where various social, economic and technical factors render the transition to a market economy impossible without profound restructuring of the whole economy. This greatly complicates the task of solving the problem of social protection.

For precisely these reasons, the ILO's activities are very helpful and important to us, especially those aspects of direct relevance to our country. We can say quite truthfully that, thanks to our cooperation with the ILO, and in particular with the Enterprise and Co-operative Development Department, the Europe Regional Department, the Training Department and others, entrepreneurship and small and medium-sized business in Belarus have been gathering strength for over three years, while the non-state sector has been growing, and the mechanisms and institutions of a socially oriented market economy have also been growing stronger.

In the past year and a half alone, with the support and direct participation of ILO experts, my Republic has held a number of important tripartite seminars, and members of our Confederation have also been able to participate in international seminars in Warsaw, Turin, Geneva and elsewhere. We hope that every effort will be made to ensure that our cooperation with the ILO is developed and strengthened.

As regards our serious difficulties, it must be said that the creation of a market economy in our country is a very difficult process. It is accompanied by an acute social and economic crisis which is the result of a significant fall in production, hyperinflation and a sharp cutback in income, savings and investment. The main reasons lie in the historical structure of my Republic's economy, a structure which is poorly adapted to the requirements of a sovereign state and marked by an exaggerated and one-sided dependence on the fuel, raw materials and commodities' markets.

The efforts of the Government and of employers are now directed towards structural conversion, increasing the export potential of the manufacturing sector, satisfying the internal demand for consumer goods, stabilizing fiscal and monetary conditions and creating a market infrastructure. In all these measures, entrepreneurs and their democratically constituted organizations play an increasingly important role, and it is they who most consistently advocate the creation of a market economy and the extension of international economic and technical cooperation. We have concluded some ten agreements with employers' associations in Europe and Asia and are ready to develop such cooperation more intensively. Our employers' associations are now playing an important part not only in our country's economy, but also in its political life.

Last month, our employers' movement passed a historical milestone when the major unions and associations established on a democratic basis a national confederation of industrialist and entrepreneurs, to which the employers of 2.5 million workers from all branches of industry, that is, over half of all workers in the Republic employed in industry, now belong. One of the main priorities of the activities of our Confederation includes the problems of ensuring social protection by means of job creation and by expanding the spheres and performance of the mechanisms of social insurance, benefits and proper wages. Here we are encountering enormous difficulties, including a growth in structural unemployment, a fall in the real income of many groups of the population as a result of inflation and above all, insufficient funds to provide protection for workers against a whole range of risks to which they and their families are exposed, in accordance with the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and other labour standards.

We clearly understand that the main factors in strengthening social protection and expanding coverage are in the application of structural reforms on the basis of new technologies through the mechanisms of the market economy, productivity and entrepreneurship. We need significant investment for this, but we cannot provide it from our own resources and this limits the extent of social protection. This is our situation. This is why we place great hopes in ILO activities and cooperation with it, because we sincerely believe in its noble goals and the very high professional as well as moral and ethical potential of its leadership and workers. We would like our cooperation with the ILO to be very productive and, as I have said, to embrace not only projects in the area of training and education, but also to cover important projects in the area of technological restructuring, the support and development of small and medium-sized businesses and the strengthening of entrepreneurship. Such projects would make it possible to overcome the crisis and ensure economic growth and thus provide the necessary funds to improve social protection. Quite frankly, in our present economic situation, the problem of social protection is clouded in uncertainty but may even be greater than when the Republic was a member of the former USSR.

We have drawn up fairly sound programmes for structural reform and to support and develop entrepreneurship and to cover a number of other areas. They all centre on a market economy system with reliable social protection. We assure the ILO that the Government, workers and employers of Belarus would welcome with open arms the participation of the ILO in our efforts to implement these and other programmes.

Original French: Mr. MBAYE (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Senegal) – It is both an honour and a pleasure for me to take the floor before this august assembly on behalf of the Workers' delegation of Senegal.

First of all I should like to join all those here in expressing my congratulations to the President upon his election to preside over the 80th session of the International Labour Conference and to his Vice-Presidents, and to the Director-General upon his re-election as the head of the International Labour Office.

The Director-General has once again with exceptional skill been able to focus the attention and interest of all delegates to this Conference on a subject of topical importance in the first part of his Report, entitled Social insurance and social protection.

In our countries of the south of Sahara the widespread crisis with, as its corollaries, the closing-down of enterprises, dismissal for economic reasons, and early retirements, has had a devastating effect on the systems of social protection which came into being at the dawn of independence and are still in an embryonic stage.

However, all experts agree that good social protection may be a guarantor of good economic development in that it contributes to a good rate of growth through the well-being and fulfilment of the people it insures.

It is certain that this conviction guides the efforts of the International Labour Office and its Director-General to get to the heart of the social concerns of our developing countries in the context of technical cooperation which, together, we are seeking to improve every day.

On behalf of the Workers' delegation, I take this opportunity to bear testimony here to the excellent quality of the assistance afforded by the ILO and its representatives in Senegal in safeguarding and improving our social protection.

Within the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal, the CNTS, we have never wished to rest on our laurels. We have remained very protective of what the workers have achieved through their persistent struggle against conservative social partners resistant to the social development of the indigenous populations.

To achieve this we have had to face much adversity and many obstacles to preserve and reform the two main institutions, the Pension Insurance Institution of Senegal (IPRES) and the Social Security Fund (CSS), while at the same time we have been pressing for the setting up of a National Sickness Assurance Fund and an Unemployment Solidarity Fund.

The approach of the Director-General to social protection in the various regions of the world, especially in our zone, is very detailed and rich: it accurately reflects reality in the field and needs no further comment. Allow me, however, to corroborate this approach by taking up briefly some aspects of our social protection system.

The population of Senegal is now estimated at some 7.5 million inhabitants, of which the working population represents hardly a third, approximately 2.5 million.

Approximately one-tenth only of this working population is virtually covered by the existing social institutions, that is nearly 3 per cent of the total population.

IPRES administers a single general compulsory retirement scheme for all workers who are regulated by the Labour Code, with specific coverage for household employees and casual workers, and a complementary framework scheme.

With the closing of enterprises, economic dismissals and early retirements causing a drastic decrease in the number of contributors, while the number of beneficiaries increased alarmingly, this institution found itself in such a state of financial asphyxia that at one time it was no longer able to pay the pension benefits.

In addition, employers, with impunity, systematically withheld workers' contributions as well as the enterprise proportion and the State obliged the institution to make large investments in public banks at very low interest rates or to take shares in stillborn national companies. Lastly, the administration of IPRES no longer met the management criteria of an institution of this size.

The Social Security Fund (CSS) administers the branch of family benefits, industrial accidents and occupational diseases. Its public establishment status has disadvantaged it more.

Like IPRES, it had to invest funds in the same banks and companies and was faced with the same management problems.

For these reasons we have fought for the autonomous management of these institutions which remain in existence today and which we need to safeguard and strengthen through rigorous reform measures.

The health insurance institutions created by the law of 3 April 1975 have not met the objectives of solidarity and equality set for them. Therefore, having vainly pleaded for them to be grouped together, our Confederation decided on a National Health Insurance Fund, which seems to have met the approval of the Government authorities.

As for the National Unemployment Solidarity Fund, the speech of the President of the Republic to the workers' delegation on 1 May this year highlighted some of the differences in his objectives that we hope to be able to resolve quickly around a negotiating table.

The majority of the population today in the agricultural and informal sectors does not benefit from any acceptable protection.

It is basically the agricultural population which suffers the most from structural adjustment policies with the budgetary restrictions they impose. As for the informal sector, as its name implies, its lack of structural organization is even more of a disavantage.

It is the duty of the State to set up a policy of appropriate social protection. It is also undeniable that it must, with the social partners, give impetus to the cultivation of national solidarity, which, along with international cooperation, including particularly that of the ILO, can be the true starting point for economic durable growth.

I cannot conclude without stating that the workers' delegation of my country condemns any attempts to challenge or weaken labour standards by governments known for their contempt of social protection Conventions.

We note that the conditions imposed upon developing countries by international financial institutions are being extended to international standards, thus endangering the balance of the United Nations system through its specialized tripartite institution, the International Labour Office.

It is unacceptable for highly industrialized countries to ratify the most elementary international conventions, and even worse to hide hypocritically behind other countries which have for years been violating basic Conventions, in order to attempt to reform international standards.

Many voices have already been raised in the Committee on the Application of Standards to reprove those attempts and call for strict respect of international standards.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Nineteenth sitting

Tuesday, 15 June 1993, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Badey, and Mr. Abdel-Hak

Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion (cont.)

Mr. HULTIN (Employers' delegate, Finland) – I am taking the floor on behalf of the Employers of the five Nordic countries: Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

Let me first join the previous speakers in congratulating the President, not only for being elected but also for so successfully presiding over the Conference.

Again, as so often before, the Director-General has selected a timely theme for his Report to this Conference. It is timely because many countries, after the fall of communism, are in need of new structures, including those of social protection. It is timely because many developing countries are fighting poverty without adequate means to guarantee the well-being of their citizens. Many industrialized countries are also experiencing economic difficulties, with rising unemployment and the ageing of their population, which places a growing burden on the active part of the workforce. In short, the Report is timely because the need for social protection is increasing at the same time as the capacity to pay is decreasing.

In the context of the ILO, one of the questions that calls out for an answer is: Should there be ILO instruments at the international level to define social protection at the national level?

In this regard, it may be useful to take a short look at the ratification behaviour of the ILO member countries. I think this is important because it will tell us something about the usefulness of having Conventions, which after all are the main products of the ILO standard-setting activity and this Labour Conference.

The ILO has to date produced some 170 Conventions. The member countries have, on average, ratified only 25 per cent of them. Consequently, the degree of ratification, that is the extent to which the product of the standard-setting activity is actually brought to us is very low. Furthermore, interest in the Conventions is decreasing since ratifications during the last ten years have dropped from 25 per cent to 10 per cent.

A qualitative look at a more detailed level will show that the industrialized countries are at the high end of the ratifications and the developing countries at the low end.

If we allow this to go on, the distance between the ratifiers and the non-ratifiers will only increase. The ILO will continue to lose credibility among other international organizations and among its own constituents and it will be seen as a dog with a soft bark and not much of a bite, as it was recently depicted in the Financial Times.

In the long run, this is of course unsustainable and if allowed to continue will eventually lead to breakdown. The victims unfortunately are those who need the social protection.

Some will challenge the validity of ratification as a measure of the value of standard-setting activity. They will argue that the example that the Convention sets is more important than the ratification itself. The Convention, in this way, becomes the objective to be attained.

I have some sympathy with this view and I consider it normal that some countries will need time to apply a Convention. However, there comes a point where we must admit that the non-ratification of a Convention is not a question of time, nor is it the problem of the country who is unable to ratify. It is rather a problem of too high and too detailed standards.

If we want the ILO to make a contribution to the development of social protection, as I think it should, the persistently low and declining level of ratification is a signal that must be taken seriously. The cause of the symptom must be identified and analysed and the bases of the standard-setting activity must be adjusted accordingly.

In the Nordic countries, we have extensive social insurance and protection systems. The systems have been gradually built and expanded on and the persistent warnings of the employers are now coming true. Along with feeble economic growth and rising unemployment, the cost of the systems is becoming overwhelming for the enterprises who directly finance a big share of social protection. For many companies the burden is becoming too great with resulting plant closures and further unemployment.

In some cases, the level and accessibility of social benefits and unemployment are such that they actually constitute a disincentive to work. The so-called Nordic model is in crisis and the system now works against itself.

It is our wish that the ILO should make a positive contribution to social development and the establishment of social protection structures in the world. What we hope for is that the ILO will reflect on and learn from its own experience and failures, and benefit from a vast field of government, worker and employer experience among its own constituents.

I would like to summarize as follows our Nordic contribution to the debate on social insurance and protection. Firstly, detailed ILO Conventions and international standards are not the answer to the establishment of social protection. Every country has its own economic and social structures that get ignored in these instruments. The ILO has already experienced the consequence of this, i.e. non-ratification of the Conventions.

Secondly, the equation of social insurance and protection has two sides to it: the security that the citizens enjoy and the cost of these benefits. The balance is extremely delicate. The security must be sufficient to ensure the well-being of citizens, but the system should not lend itself to abuse and encourage disincentives to work. The cost side of the equation must not constitute an overwhelming burden for enterprises, throwing them into a spiral of economic difficulties, and producing unemployment rather than jobs.

Thirdly, without economic growth and productive employment the equation will not work. It needs to be recognized that the engine of social development is productive enterprise activity. Without this, in the long term there will be no sustainable economic growth, there will be no growth in employment and there will be no wealth creation. Market economy and enterprise activity must therefore get a clearer and higher profile in the ILO's activities.

Fourthly, the ILO's member countries should be able to benefit from the vast experience of its constituents in the social field. For example, technical cooperation and multidisciplinary teams can be tools for the ILO to disseminate unbiased information and assistance and to encourage countries to promote self-driven social development. Assistance should therefore not be made conditional on the application of standards.

Lastly, there have been major developments in the world. To have a constructive impact, the ILO must continuously re-evaluate itself and adapt to the changes. Because of the fall of socialism, the market economy and entrepreneurship are not only generally accepted but have become the elements on which future labour markets will be based. So, for the ILO to be successful in the future, it needs to give a much higher profile to the market economy and entrepreneurship, in all its activities and at all levels of its organization.

Original French: Mr. NORDMANN (Government delegate, Switzerland) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations also go to the Government, Employer and Worker Vice-Presidents.

I should also like to thank the staff of the Office and the Director-General for their commitment throughout the year to the work of the International Labour Organization. And finally, I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his recent re-election.

This year we have before us the Report of the Director-General on a theme of great topicality, namely the future of social security and social protection schemes.

My delegation endorses the Director-General's approach and the conclusions. Lower birth rates, the ageing of the population, unemployment and the explosion in health costs are all factors which imperil the future of social security systems, in Switzerland as elsewhere. My country has already taken steps to consolidate its social protection system.

I dare hope that this discussion in plenary will lead to concrete actions within our Organization. Indeed, the choice of this theme shows how important it is for the ILO to react rapidly to the challenges confronting its Members. Such a topical theme should not remain simply inscribed in the records of the Organization as an abstract discussion. It should be followed up, for example, by a serious reflection on the relevance of international social security standards adopted by the International Labour Conference in past decades.

Future reports of the Director-General to be discussed in plenary should, therefore, as in the past, deal with the current challenges confronting our societies. But they should also serve to legitimize positive action by the Organization, thereby pre-empting the need for long and excessively formal and sophisticated debates, which tend to delay urgently needed responses.

The year 1993 is a key year for the Organization: the recent re-election of the Director-General, a new Governing Body, Programme and Budget proposals for the biennium 1994-95, preparation for the 75th anniversary, amongst others. All the elements seem to be in place for undertaking reforms and preparing our Organization for the challenges of the twenty-first century.

It therefore seems wise to ask whether we are making good choices for the future of the ILO, and whether the various reforms envisaged will guarantee the ILO's authority in the future.

Our world has recently experienced a series of shocks which I need not describe. Unemployment is growing, affecting an increasing share of the active population. The State is obliged to withdraw from some of its traditional activities.

It is our duty together to find a response to these challenges. The ILO has a particularly important and specific role to play in this by virtue of its knowledge and expertise in the economic and social fields, and because its Constitution so requires.

First of all, we must equip the ILO with the means which will enable it better to coordinate its actions with those of other international organizations within or outside the United Nations system. In fact, experience shows that parallel activities are still very common among international organizations, and often produce no concrete results. But few organizations have the benefit of tripartism and can offer the leaders of the world of labour and social policy the possibility of meeting to discuss the matters which concern them. Few organizations have the means available to the ILO to translate these debates into international labour standards and technical cooperation.

In this connection, we must seek to make the Organization even more effective. The efforts and the time devoted to our debates in Conference should lead to more concrete results in member States.

Secondly, we must enable the ILO to take up more swiftly the topical questions to which it should respond more rapidly.

In this connection we think that given the situation of employment in the world – and I would like to emphasize that it is also becoming a source of deep concern in my country – the ILO should immediately make a special effort to refocus its activities in order to establish a long-term strategy for job creation. This new strategy should already be reflected in the specific priorities of the Organization's next programme and budget.

Thirdly, in the social field, in the broadest meaning of the term, the ILO should in future have a policy to enable it to establish or revise sufficiently flexible international standards which do not impede the operation of the labour markets and which promote economic growth and job creation. I want to make it clear that I am absolutely not questioning the legitimacy of the ILO's standard-setting activities; I am suggesting that perhaps the time has come to do less, but to do it better. You all know Switzerland's commitment to international labour standards and to the credibility of the supervisory machinery. This is precisely why we think it is important to preserve the significance of the ratification of international labour Conventions, and not to create instruments which are too detailed or difficult to ratify.

Fourthly, technical cooperation has a decisive role to play. In any event, it is important to guarantee that the ILO's technical cooperation system continues to support the application of international labour standards, without lessening their scope by creating a double standard in application, depending on purely political or economic local considerations.

Finally, given the climate of liberalization and the internationalization of markets, the ILO should also adopt a clear strategy. We think that the original mandate of the Organization contains an essential element which has been somewhat neglected in recent years: the guarantee of balanced conditions for world competition, through the acceptance of a universally recognized social minimum. It is therefore necessary to promote by all means the establishment, by revision or adoption, of international labour standards which are programmable and achievable in stages or levels of obligation, according to economic possibilities. Their application should be acceptable to everyone and sufficiently flexible so as not to hamper the social development of the most disadvantaged economies, or to produce serious social regression in the developed countries. Thus we will succeed in establishing a kind of social GATT which will strengthen the social role of the ILO, and we will moreover avoid the danger of applying double standards and weakening the supervisory system.

These few suggestions confirm that we will retain our confidence in the ILO, especially if it succeeds in the difficult task of legitimizing its activities. I can assure you that my country will try to promote true reforms in the ILO so that it can continue to work for universal welfare and social justice.

Mr. FLYNN (representative of the European Communities) – I am pleased to be able to address this Conference on behalf of the Commission of the European Communities. The Commission attaches great importance to the role of the ILO as a world forum for social and labour matters. We especially appreciate the tripartite nature of the Organization. Your conferences are important occasions not only for the setting of world standards on many important issues but also for the unique meeting place they provide for representatives of governments, employers and workers from all over the world.

Many of the issues you address are also the subject of action within the European Community. Let me assure you that the Commission is determined that its experience should be put at your disposal in a constructive manner so that the Community and its member States can play a helpful and positive role in the work of the ILO and particularly in the setting of world standards which reflect the diverse needs of the international community.

Let me turn now to the main issues facing the European Community in the social field.

The core problem which we must all solve is that of unemployment, which now affects 17 million people in the European Community. The Commission has recently adopted a European Community-wide employment framework which has the support of the Council of Ministers. It is a new and I firmly believe radical approach addressing the employment and unemployment problems which we face in the Community.

We are in a period of recession, but even when we have more rapid growth we are not creating sufficient jobs to absorb those people entering the labour market and to reduce the number of unemployed.

So this initiative is part of an integrated approach to address our failure to create enough jobs for those who would like to work. This process began with the "growth initiative" adopted at the European Council during the Edinburgh summit last December. The framework for employment is a complement to that growth initiative.

Our aim is to allow for more concerted and coordinated action by all the Community institutions and by the member States to achieve a more employment-intensive pattern of growth. The aim is to focus on the employment problem, not just the unemployment problem. It is not only a strategy to help those without work to enter or re-enter the labour market (although of course this is a major element of the initiative) but also to provide jobs for all those who would otherwise like to work.

We want to send out three important messages:

Firstly, levels of unemployment are unacceptably high. This harms competitiveness just as much as it affects the structures of our societies.

Secondly, we need stronger economic growth, but that alone will not resolve our employment problems. We need a more employment-intensive pattern of growth.

Thirdly, employment is everyone's concern. Primary responsibility for employment of course lies with the member States but we all have a role to play – governments, employers, workers, action groups and others. We all need to be involved, mobilized and supportive in order to provide an integrated policy response. I believe that the involvement of all the relevant partners at the local, national and Community levels, notably the social partners, is crucial to developing appropriate responses.

Unemployment leads to many other problems: poverty, social exclusion, ill health and disillusionment. The time has now come to reflect on what are the fundamental causes of the problem and on what can be done to solve them.

Moving to the related issue of social security, I have noted that in his excellent Report on social insurance and social protection Mr. Hansenne recalls that the notion of social security originated in Europe around the end of the last century and subsequently spread far and wide. As he rightly emphasizes, however, substantial problems within the basic system continue to demand our attention.

These problems are also of concern to the Commission of the European Community and I am glad to see that our thinking is developing along the same lines.

It is a well-known fact that the Welfare State is currently under considerable pressure. Social protection systems are facing unprecedented challenges:

The demographic trends: the ageing of the population is leading to a reconsideration of existing pension schemes and of the implications for health costs; new needs are also emerging, such as insurance for dependent people.

The evolution of the labour market: the high rate of unemployment and the knock-on effects to the growing problems of social exclusion put a new emphasis on the need for a strong safety net and minimum income provisions.

Changes in family structures: a growing debate is taking place concerning individual rights and approaches to deal with the emergence of new family models.

These developments call for new thinking, in particular with regard to the articulation between income and employment policies.

The Commission has almost completed what it undertook to do at the end of the 1980s in relation to social policy. It has presented measures in an action programme to implement the Community Social Charter adopted in 1989.

Moreover, the Maastricht Treaty on European Union sets new objectives and opens up new possibilities, particularly for developing relations between management and labour at the Community level. You all know how much importance we attach to the European social dialogue.

The social partners have always been an important part of the European social dimension. We are now moving to a new phase where the social partners find themselves placed at the very centre of the decision-making process.

For these reasons, I have announced my intention to publish this autumn a Green Paper on the future direction of social policy at the Community level. I have asked that there be as broad as possible an input into that paper from across the Community.

I hope that there will be a wide-ranging debate with all the people concerned, including the citizens of Europe, on the role and the place of Community action in the social field and also on the links between Community social policy and other policies, and above all economic policies.

In conclusion, I must pay tribute to the efforts made by the ILO to improve the quality of work and employment relationships throughout the world. For our own part, we will endeavour to improve the social environment. I hope that our cooperation will continue as in the past and above all prove fruitful. For my part, I can assure you of my continued support to look for constructive relationships between us.

Original Spanish: Mr. SEMEREL (representative of the World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers) – I would like to express to the President and to the Vice-Presidents my very warm congratulations in my own name and on behalf of the affiliated workers of the World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his unanimous re-election as Director-General of the ILO for a further term of office. Let me also congratulate and welcome the new member States of the brotherhood of the ILO, and welcome the return of the Republic of Viet Nam.

I read the Director-General's Report on Social insurance and social protection and on ILO activities carried out in the course of the past year with great interest. Social security should have a tripartite structure with a board of directors established on an equal basis so as to ensure proper management. It should not be a matter which is the sole responsibility of the government or a minister, although it would sometimes appear that decisions are in fact taken only by the minister or the government in power.

As the economic structures have changed we cannot go on accepting that governments should manipulate social security to allow their friends to benefit subsequently from its privatization.

We have many complaints against social security in many developing countries. Pensions are too low. Medical services are inadequate. The families of those insured are not sufficiently covered, etc. We should not allow the privatization of social security. What we have to do is, on a tripartite basis, to improve social security. The State has the fundamental task of guaranteeing a basic standard of living for its people.

The considerable work done by the ILO in the application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning human rights, freedom of association, equality of rights, employment, the development of enterprises and cooperatives, working conditions and the working environment and other specific sectors, which include hotels and tourism, agriculture and food, constitutes a wide range of activities which should strengthen the ILO still further.

The World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers, affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour, has been engaged in a series of labour activities, particularly in the countries of the Third World which we would like to emphasize, because agriculture will continue to be a determinant factor in the universe. Food has become a political and social instrument which is the basis of human life.

Workers in the agriculture, food and drink sectors reject the neo-liberal offensive which is being imposed on many countries of the Third World and which is punishing the poorest sectors and creating political instability in many countries. Our association condemns the policies of the EEC to limit to 2 million tons its imports of bananas, which will lead to the unemployment of 175,000 workers in Latin America and is creating an economic crisis throughout Central America, Colombia and Ecuador.

We as workers are not opposed to the countries of Europe protecting the countries of the Third World which traditionally have been their allies and sometimes their colonies. But we believe that the industrialized countries should keep their trade relations open, so that we can avoid situations in which the developed countries impose policies on the poor countries, telling them what to buy and sell, at what price and in what quantity.

We have talked about food security, which is an individual right which human beings need for their development. But it is more than that. It is an indispensable right for poor countries and for their survival.

So we would like to take this opportunity of speaking from this rostrum to express our unreserved solidarity to the workers of Telecom in Colombia, and in particular, for the 13 persons detained in the Modelo prison in Bogota, especially Heriberto López, whose only fault was defending the sovereignty of the country.

The WFAFW, as a representative organization of workers of the Third World, makes an appeal for the humanization of the economy in which the centre of every process should be man rather than the market, as advocated by some people who want to give instruments priority over people.

The working man, the human being, must be the centre of all political, economic, cultural and social activities. We would also like to take this opportunity to ask countries that maintain colonies, overseas departments and free associate States, to allow the workers of those territories to participate as delegates in the work and meetings of the ILO and the International Labour Conference. As common delegates in special cases, we make a fraternal petition for representatives of the workers of Puerto Rico, the Puerto Rican Central of Workers, to be included in the delegation of the United States.

As secretary-general of the Curaçāo Workers' Central Organization, I should like to announce that, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, our central organization suggested to the Government of the Netherlands Antilles through the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Mr. Frank Rozendal, who is present here at this session of the Conference, that it issue special stamps on 1 June 1994. This request was approved by the Minister of Transport and Communications.

Delegates present at next year's session of the Conference will have the opportunity to acquire them. We are living in a world which is fraught with enormous social and economic crisis, political turmoil, ethnic violence, civil wars, and the threat of hegemony. The World Federation of Agriculture and Food Workers, together with the WCL, invites all workers of all continents to demonstrate their spirit of solidarity and to embrace initiatives of cooperation and unity of action in support of the processes of peace, security and fraternity.

Mr. ZAINAL (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – Let me, at the very outset, convey the fraternal greetings of Malaysian workers to their counterparts all over the globe whose representatives are gathered here at this distinguished assembly of perhaps some of the best minds in the realm of governance, capital and labour. May I also, on behalf of the Malaysian workers' delegation to this session of the Conference, express our hearty congratulations to Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as President of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and to the Vice-Presidents. It is an honour they richly deserve.

The Malaysian Trades Union Congress, in its capacity as the umbrella organization for more than 150 trade union affiliates, with a total membership of more than half a million workers, has kept and will always keep the well-being of the toiling masses as close as possible to its heart, and we have left no stone unturned since our establishment way back in 1951 to ensure that a fair wage is given for fair labour.

The people of Palestine have waited many years now for a fair settlement of their long drawn-out problem. Those living in Bosnia and Herzegovina are no better off either.

The apartheid policy of the minority South African Government is yet another inhuman practice that has to be condemned in the strongest terms. We hope that the United Nations will continue with its untiring efforts to bring peace and stability to all these troubled areas.

Now let us take a look at the socio-economic and labour situation in developing countries in the Third World. Many of them, in their eager pursuit of rapid economic growth through the introduction of foreign capital, have ridden roughshod over the rights of their workers, all in the name of "foreign investment promotion".

Multinational companies using foreign investment as a bait have managed to ensnare several gullible, perhaps desperate, governments in their vicious corporate tentacles and squeeze them to submission. Labour legislation and legal redress machinery in several developing countries have been manipulated by these multinational corporations to deliver a virtually union-free labour environment for them to exploit at will, while filling their coffers with fabulous profits derived from the unending toil of the helpless labour masses. More than 120,000 workers in Malaysia's fast-growing electronics industry have been attempting for more than two decades with the assistance of the Malaysian Trades Union Congress to form a national union of their own choice to represent them and protect their rights.

The Malaysian Government, under severe pressure from the multinational corporations that own these electronics factories in economic processing zones, has continuously stymied the MTUC's unbending efforts to secure the formation of a national union for workers in the electronics industry. Let it be made clear here, that the Malaysian Trades Union Congress is raising this issue at this session of the Conference as a last resort, because we have already exhausted all domestic remedies, including the process of law, but no solution is in sight.

The Government of Malaysia is only prepared to allow the formation of fragmented in-house unions. We are firm in our conviction that the wishes of the workers for a national union should be respected.

At two ILO-organized conferences held recently in Tehran, Iran, and in Manila, Philippines, proposals were made to the effect that a separate set of labour standards be introduced for developing countries. These proposals, to say the least, constitute a total departure from the basic tenets of the Constitution of the ILO, wherein duality of standards and multiplicity in application cannot be condoned in member countries. All of us present at this session are well aware of the fact that though many member States, whether industrialized or developing countries, have ratified several ILO conventions, it is a moot point whether these Conventions have been implemented in full by these countries.

Given the fact that the ILO has already exercised a fair measure of flexibility in this regard, it may well be advisable for the ILO to refrain from even considering any proposal from any quarter for a separate set of labour standards for developing countries.

As rightly mentioned by the Director-General in his Report, social security and means-related superannuation or pension schemes are the basis for the sustained well-being of workers in their twilight years. It is our fervent hope that at this distinguished Conference time and collective energies will be directed towards the tangible realization of this highly rewarding social objective and set the pace for all member nations to adopt, follow and emulate.

We are singularly confident that the spirit of tripartism will continue to hold court in all dealings with government, employers and workers. Though the concept of tripartism has been put through severe stress and strain on account of increasingly different priorities of an immediate nature, it is, nevertheless, the most trusted and reliable form and approach and would eventually put paid to any misconception as regards the very viability of trilateral relations in a rapidly changing world.

May I, once again, put on record my profound gratitude to the ILO for having given me this wonderful opportunity to address this august gathering in an aura of good will and cooperation. The magnitude and direction of our relations, within and without, are adjustable to suit the needs of different situations but our principles are not negotiable at any price.

Mr. MOKHEHLE (Minister of Employment and Social Welfare, Lesotho) – I would like to congratulate the President and his Officers on his unanimous election to guide the deliberations of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Your distinguished career and wide experience in the labour field will no doubt enable you to steer this Conference's discussions to a successful conclusion. May I also on behalf of my delegation extend our most sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the ILO. We wish him all the success and courage to lead the Organization through the challenges currently confronting it.

I would like to begin by informing this august assembly that following the requests of the multi-party general election which was held in my country on 27 March this year, Lesotho has returned to civilian rule after 23 years of social and political stagnation. We are delighted to inform you that the Basotho Congress Party (BCP), under the leadership of Dr. Ntsu Mokhehle, won all 65 constituencies, the election having been contested by more than six political parties.

The election process was monitored by international observers from the United Nations, the Commonwealth, the World Council of Churches, and international republican associations, as well as regional and subregional organizations. The observers were unanimous in hailing the elections as fair, free and peaceful. The Government of the Kingdom of Lesotho is now engaged in settling up the necessary democratic structures and ensuring that they will function properly in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution.

With regard to South Africa, here, too, there are hopeful signs that elections leading to majority rule may be held early next year, and we believe that, with continued encouragement from the international community, democracy may be realized.

If I now turn to the agenda of the Conference, my delegation commends the excellent reports prepared for the delegates. They are comprehensive and well researched and we hope that they will facilitate discussion and understanding. In particular, we note with approval the Director-General's apt choice of subject for this Conference; namely, social insurance and social protection. We share the view that economic prosperity is not the only factor determining a country's ability to protect its disadvantaged groups. Community willingness, as well as economic and political commitment, are also needed if progress is to be made in social protection.

In this regard, I gratefully acknowledge the fact that the ILO has carried out a feasibility study on the expansion of social security in my country. We still hope for continued cooperation with the ILO in this area and for international assistance to enhance our social security structure.

The Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General both provided us with a wide range of activities and services to the ILO member States. We are grateful for that. My country, Lesotho, has been among the beneficiaries of this valuable assistance. The ILO recently amended, updated and codified our Labour Laws to form a single code. I am happy to report that the Lesotho Labour Code has now become law, effective from 1 April 1993.

As regards the 1994-95 budget proposals, we support the budget, but we note that the ILO has been operating a zero-growth budget for some years. We are aware that zero growth results in an inability by the Organization to meet some of the demands and expectations of members for services. We also note that, despite the zero-growth budget, enormous demands for ILO services are being made all over the world, especially in eastern and central Europe and Africa, as a result of the emergence of democracy and structural adjustment programmes. The success of our endeavours in this regard depends on the degree and level of the ILO's response during these critical times. It is our hope that the zero-growth budget will not be a permanent feature and that a more responsible budget will be formulated to ensure that full and effective services are provided to member States.

My delegation welcomes the ILO Technical Cooperation Programme which is intended to promote active partnership and the implementation of ILO-sponsored projects. We believe that the deployment of ILO multi-disciplinary teams in our region can bring the ILO closer to its constituencies as envisaged. However, since this is a new development, we believe that more details and better guidance on the functioning of the teams and their relationship with member States and other social partners need to be clearly spelled out to avoid misunderstanding.

All the agenda items of this Conference are important topics. Discussions on the prevention of major industrial accidents and the discussion on part-time work, are very important. Allow me in conclusion to observe that while part-time work programmes seem to be causing concern in developed countries at the moment, we believe that fuller debate on these concepts will provide useful lessons to the developing countries for any problems which may arise in the future.

Original Chinese: Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate, China) – First of all, please allow me to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the ILO Conference. I wish the session every success under his leadership and that of the Vice-Presidents.

It is very timely and significant to choose social security as the theme of this session. We share a common interest in the Report of the Director-General and the theme of the session, partly because social security is both a reflection of social civilization and social progress, and an important condition for social stability and economic growth, and partly because this is a very practical issue and a focus of attention for China in the process of its reform and opening up. The successful solution of this social problem is in the interest of various parties and has a direct impact on the reform process and our objective of developing a socialist market economy. Meanwhile, as China is gradually turning into an ageing society with a national average life expectancy of approximately 70, the issue of social security has become all the more important, especially when China is the most densely populated country in the world. Its urban labour force is composed of 148 million people, and more than 100 million of this massive labour force worked in urban enterprises at the end of last year. As the employers' organization in China, we are naturally concerned with this issue.

Our basic point of view is that the level of social security depends on the level of economic development of a country or region. In the case of China, we must develop a social security system suitable to its specific conditions. The social security system requires the Government, enterprises and employees to share responsibility and combine their efforts. The social security system should be socialized and ultimately developed into an independent network covering the whole society. As representative of the Chinese employers' organization, I take great pleasure in briefing you on the current situation of and prospects for social security in China.

Firstly, China has already developed an embryonic form of multi-level old-age pension insurance system combining a basic pension fund, a supplementary enterprise pension fund and individual pension deposit. The basic pension fund is jointly financed by the Government, enterprises and the employees. The enterprise pays its contribution to the basic pension fund before tax payment, based on a percentage of its payroll, as specified by the local government. The individual employee pays less than 3 per cent of his or her wage. In addition to the basic pension insurance provided by the State, the enterprise has a supplementary pension fund for its employees. It is set up on the basis of the enterprise's own economic strength and financed by its own resources. By the end of 1993 about two-thirds of the provinces, autonomous regions, municipalities and cities with independent budgets witnessed the trial adoption of a supplementary pension insurance system in their more profitable enterprises. Some regions and enterprises also introduced the method of linking enterprise supplementary pension insurance with an individual pension insurance deposit. This means that within a certain limit, the more money an employee puts in his or her own pension deposit, the more the enterprise adds to it. The implementation of this multi-level pension insurance system increases the sources of funds and helps maintain the living standards of the retired workers. On the other hand, it enhances the cohesiveness of the enterprise and workers' sense of participation in social security. By the end of 1992 this integrated pension insurance system basically covered all the state-owned enterprises in China and extended to the collective enterprises in 1,759 cities and districts. Some cities adopted the unified proportion and process for the financing and operation of the basic pension funds. Statistics show that 85 million employees of 490,000 enterprises of different types, including over 17 million pensioners, were covered by the old-age pension insurance in China in 1992.

Secondly, considerable progress has been made in the reform of the industrial injury insurance system. To ensure workers' rights to medical treatment, maintain their basic living standards and receive financial compensation and other material assistance in the case of an industrial accident or occupational disease, relevant standards and regulations have been formulated. Labour appraisal committees have been set up in more than 2,000 cities and districts in a bid to safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of the workers.

Thirdly, a reform of the medical insurance system has been carried out on a large scale. Due to the problems existing in the old medical insurance system, the current reform concentrates on two areas: (a) the individual worker pays a small percentage, generally 10 per cent, of his or her medical expenses. The amount paid by the individual annually must not exceed a certain limit; (b) the medical expenses for major treatment are covered by the integrated medical insurance on a sectoral or district basis whereby the enterprise and worker share the costs.

Fourthly, the unemployment insurance system has been established in order to safeguard the basic right for subsistence of the unemployed and facilitate social stability. Apart from paying relief and medical expenses to the unemployed, the unemployment insurance agency also provides support to those enterprises which operate at half or an even lower capacity and helps them overcome difficulties for the purpose of reducing unemployment.

Reforms mean a continuing search for new ways. Some of the security systems described above have already been implemented to a large extent and some are still under discussion and experimentation.

Social security is a common concern of the governments, employers and workers of countries enjoying economic growth. We believe that the discussions at this session should provide an opportunity for everybody to learn from each other's useful experience and thus contribute to the further development and perfection of the social security system of our respective countries. Let us learn from each other and benefit together.

Mr. JENNINGS (representative of the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) – First, let me lend my voice to those who have congratulated the President on his election and, on behalf of FIET, wish him every success in the exercise of his duties.

The International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees (FIET) represents over 11 million trade union members in 370 unions in over 100 countries. Our members work in the private services sector – in areas such as commerce, banking, insurance, property services, social insurance and health care, and in industry, as clerical and technical staff. Many are women; many are professional and managerial workers.

Services now account for more than half of all jobs in industrialized countries. Many of these new jobs are part-time jobs. Our discussion in this year's session of the Conference shows that part-time workers are too often second-class workers. They have jobs, not careers. They are overwhelmingly women.

Many employers and governments argue that part-time jobs enable women to reconcile work and family responsibilities. Regrettably, nothing could be further from the truth. So often these low-paid, unprotected, dead-end jobs trap women in poor quality employment and actually widen the division in society between men and women.

Employers everywhere have exploited part-time workers. Where part-time work is undertaken it should be on acceptable conditions. Hence the need for labour standards for part-time staff.

Those same governments and employers are seizing on high unemployment figures to justify creating low-paid, unprotected employment in general. Such employment widens the divisions in society as a whole. It can never be said too often that the ILO was set up precisely to fight against these things.

Times may change. This is 1993, not 1919. But poverty, oppression, child labour and the lack of basic freedoms are still the man-made scourges that create deeply divided and unequal societies. We should not fight any less against them now than before.

The United Nations recently warned of the potential for human strife if the growth of unemployment is not reversed. It called for a billion new jobs to be created by the year 2000. But the creation of low-wage, low-skilled and environmentally unfriendly employment and the removal of social protection from millions of working men and women is a no-win scenario. It will only result in more poverty, more unemployment and more inequality.

It is in this context that we have to see the campaign being waged to weaken the ILO. And it is why we have to denounce arguments that present employment and dignity as either/or alternatives.

This year's Report of the Director-General makes the point forcefully that the social dimension is a co-partner of economic growth. It maps out the role of the ILO in developing much-needed systems of social security and social protection in member States and stresses the importance of tripartism.

The ILO needs to promote further tripartite structures, particularly in regions undergoing rapid change, such as Central and Eastern Europe. It needs to help governments to promote sustainable and equitable economic growth as a goal for all countries, whatever the region. Some Asian governments, for example, think that there is something about their region which makes ILO standards inappropriate. What could this be, we wonder; a greater propensity for suffering?

We need to reiterate that it is for the ILO, not individual government blocks, or the IMF and the World Bank for that matter, to establish labour standards, and it is in everybody's interests for the ILO to do so.

The work can only be reinforced with the inclusion of a social clause in GATT. If no social clause is included, what finer proof is there that governments are turning away from their social responsibilities.

The ILO's authority in doing this will be strengthened if it can respond better to the globalization of the economy and changing work patterns. As we have said before, this also means taking more into account the private services sector.

The ILO must develop strategies to prevent multinationals from carrying out global social dumping. Last year, when I spoke here, I also referred to the need for the ILO to sharpen its ability to influence the conduct of multinational companies. I was dismayed to see that the ILO's Multinational Enterprises Branch and subprogramme were candidates for the chopping block during negotiations in the Governing Body on the 1994-95 budget.

We in FIET oppose attempts to reduce the scope and influence of the ILO's sectoral activities. They play a fundamental role in the ILO. They strengthen the ILO's links with the workplace and complement and reinforce the general activities of the ILO. The interrelation between the ILO's sectoral and general activities should be strengthened, not weakened.

ILO standards are at the heart of the ILO and should remain so. This year's remarks of the Committee of Experts, particularly on discrimination in employment, show that there is much to do. They call more than ever for an affirmation of the universality and indivisibility of the ILO's standards. ILO standards are relevant for all countries, for all regions. What is required is that the ILO have more means at its disposal to enforce those labour standards.

For all of our affiliates in over 100 countries of this world, these standards are a bulwark against oppression. Unions everywhere are faced with government and employer interference in the right to organize and to bargain collectively, particularly where workers occupy professional and managerial functions.

Around the world, in Fiji and in the Republic of Korea, unions face discrimination and restrictions on the right to organize. In Pakistan artificially promoting employees out of the bargaining unit is used as a form of union busting. In Swaziland repeated court injunctions by the authorities have blocked industrial action. In Turkey bank workers cannot go on strike and those employed in public sector banks, who constitute half of the workforce in the banking sector, cannot organize in trade unions. In Colombia and Guatemala and El Salvador violent acts against trade unionists continue. In China repression of human rights continues unabated. In Costa Rica and Peru, as well as other Latin American countries, the adoption of neo-liberal policies has brought a wave of privatization which has also engulfed crucial services like social security and health. Our affiliates in Costa Rica and Peru are not only concerned with their own employment security and working conditions, they are also concerned about the public health and the social security of the working people as a whole.

In Switzerland, one of the world's largest insurance companies, Zurich Insurance, is guilty of a vehement attack on union rights in the United Kingdom. Within days of purchasing the Municipal Mutual Insurance (MMI) in the United Kingdom, the Zurich company, under its President, Mr. Hüppi, unilaterally withdrew from a collective bargaining agreement with our British affiliate, the Manufacturing, Science and Finance Union (MSF), an agreement which had been in operation for over 20 years. From one day to the next 1,500 staff found themselves without trade union representation.

Yesterday in Zurich, FIET and the MSF launched an international campaign on Zurich.

The Zurich action is not compatible with ILO standards. It is a breach of human rights and the Swiss company should reverse its action.

In the United States the multinational Delhaize's affiliate, Food Lion, has been engaging in union busting and has restricted the right of its employees to organize. In Belgium, Food Lion's base, rights are respected, but they do the opposite in the United States. This is not acceptable to our 11 million members. Delhaize should respect rights wherever they operate.

In closing, our affiliates need more than ever for the ILO to focus on what it was set up to do: to support measures by governments to achieve full and productive employment, social protection and equality through the application of labour standards. These should be the key messages that define next year's 75th anniversary celebrations of the ILO.

I would like to finish by congratulating the Director-General on his re-election by the Governing Body. We agree with him that social justice must inspire the political choices made by the world's governments and, of course, by the ILO itself.

In his new term we hope that he will champion the cause that ILO standards are respected and that governments and employers recognize that trade union rights are a fundamental part of human rights.

Original Afghan: Mr. BALKHI (Government delegate, Afghanistan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the delegation of the Islamic State of Afghanistan and on my own behalf, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his unanimous re-election and to wish him success in the future. I assure him of the full cooperation of the delegation of the Islamic State of Afghanistan in ensuring that the deliberations of the Conference are successful.

We hope that its deliberations and results will lead to the expansion of cooperation between the ILO and its member States, and will also have a constructive and positive impact.

We Muslims attach great importance to labour and its correct regulation. Our view of the dignity of labour stems from Islam's lofty values, according to which work is not only an effective social activity to maintain life but also an act of worship and that the worker is beloved of God and sanctified by holy Islam.

A review of the history of the ILO's activities shows that a considerable amount of work has been accomplished in the past and their parallel with recent developments in the world the ILO's activities have been extended and have acquired new dimensions.

The present session of the Conference is taking place in a context of rapid political, social, economic and cultural change in the world in recent years, which has confronted our countries and international institutions with unprecedentedly complex issues.

In such circumstances, countries and international institutions are striving to design and implement a development policy in which economic, social, cultural and human developments will be mutually inclusive and social justice taken into consideration as the ultimate aim of development.

A review of the ILO's activities shows that this organization has already fulfilled certain specifications and is pursuing new goals in line with the new world situation.

The subjects on the agenda of this year's session of the Conference are of special importance. The first part of the Director-General's Report to the Conference deals with the development of systems of social insurance and social protection in ILO member States and ways of improving their effectiveness. In the present situation, the need to improve social security systems constitutes for various reasons one of the major goals of social policy in many countries. But as the need for improved social security mechanisms has increased, the resources available have declined. In such circumstances, we feel that during the deliberations and discussions on this matter it is essential to determine the key issues and social policies in this area and to take concrete measures to further improve social security systems and strengthen the role of the ILO in this process.

The second part of the Report contains an account of the activities of the organization in 1992. We note that the ILO has done a great deal of work in the social and economic spheres, particularly in the fields of international labour standards and human rights, employment and development, entrepreneurship, management training, labour administration, working conditions and environment, social security, labour information and statistics, and technical cooperation.

The above-mentioned activities play an important role in improving conditions in the world of work. The programme and budget proposals for 1994-1995, which are being discussed at the present session, contain a new approach to the planning of ILO activities, and provide for a considerable reorganization of the technical capacity of the Organization. We hope that this new policy will bring the ILO closer to its members through a better understanding of their priorities and needs, consequently fulfilling a desirable precondition for achieving the principle objectives of the Organization, namely the promotion and advancement of democracy, the struggle against poverty and improvement of social protection. The technical items included in the agenda, such as prevention of industrial disasters, part-time work and the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, are the issues which have caught the attention of the countries concerned.

We are confident that the views exchanged and the measures taken in these areas by the Conference will mark an important step towards the protection of workers, the public and the environment from the consequences of industrial disasters. The current circumstances are such that major changes will have to be made in the future direction and in the machinery of the ILO's technical cooperation, and this is an issue of great interest to all Members of the ILO, especially our own war-stricken country.

As you are aware, the Islamic Revolution succeeded in Afghanistan last year after 14 years of struggle and the Islamic State was established in our country.

In spite of the difficulties, we have started and are continuing to implement major changes in the political, social and economic spheres and to work for peace and political stabilization based on the role of holy Islam. The Islamic State of Afghanistan respects and observes the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and wishes to have good relations with all nations, especially the Islamic countries and our neighbours. The foreign policy of the Islamic State of Afghanistan is based on the principles of peaceful coexistence and respect for the rights of nations, non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries and support for the right to self-determination of peoples. In conformity with the principles of Islam, the Islamic State of Afghanistan is making every effort to ensure social justice in all spheres of the political and social life of our society, and is taking significant steps to improve the living conditions of the people.

Vigorous action will be taken to lay the necessary foundations for active participation by all economic sectors, especially national entrepreneurs and internal and external investors, in the process of reconstruction and socio-economic development in our country.

Afghanistan, in spite of having rich natural and human resources, has remained backward and is one of the least developed countries. The country's economy depends mainly on agriculture. The previous regime misused material, financial and natural resources and the wealth of the nation for military aims and the destruction of our people.

The war inflicted enormous human and financial damage on our country. Thousands of mosques, schools, houses, roads, highways, vehicles, millions of head of livestock and most of the irrigation, agricultural, technical and communication systems were destroyed. The war inflicted irreparable damage on the country's human resources. About three million people lost their lives and a considerable number were disabled. More than five million people became refugees living abroad. The above-mentioned factors had a negative impact on the general economic foundations, complicating the existing problems in the country's development process.

Owing to its current requirements and difficulties, the Islamic State of Afghanistan has put the reconstruction of the country at the top of its agenda. Given the multi-dimensional problems that exist and the damage inflicted on our national economy, the rehabilitation of Afghanistan is not possible on the basis of resources alone. We are therefore confident that the United Nations system and donor countries will extend financial and humanitarian assistance and help and support Afghanistan.

Afghanistan is one of the oldest members of the ILO, has constantly supported the constructive activities of this Organization and seeks to apply its decisions and resolutions in conformity with its national requirements and conditions. Since Afghanistan is at present implementing a vast rehabilitation programme, we believe that now more than ever before the prevailing conditions warrant cooperation and assistance to Afghanistan from the ILO.

We therefore request the responsible units of the ILO to design a special programme of assistance, taking an active part in the process of rehabilitation and allocating and distributing the necessary funds and resources, as emphasized in the joint communiqué of the 13th Conference of Asia and Pacific Labour Ministers in Teheran, giving priority to Afghanistan.

Before concluding, I would like to state that the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan requires the urgent assistance of the ILO and its member countries in the following fields: training of skilled specialists and technical personnel, rehabilitation of disabled and handicapped people, establishment and revision of equipment and vocational training centres, creation of employment opportunities for disabled women, the despatch of experts for methodological assistance, the design and planning of projects to create employment opportunities for returnees, the promotion of economic efficiency in enterprises and the improvement of the management and administrative reforms, the design and implementation of projects to extend self-employment, the design of special projects in the field of human resources development and the establishment of small computerized systems in the sectors of manpower planning and placement.

(Mr. Badey takes the chair.)

Mr. BOEDJOSASTRO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia) – It is a great honour indeed for me to have the opportunity of presenting this statement on behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia at this auspicious gathering of the ILO.

May I congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election as President of this Conference, and further Mr. Badey, Mr. Tabani and Mr. Bustos Huerta for their respective election as Vice-Presidents. I am convinced that with their vast experience and wise guidance the International Labour Conference will proceed to success as expected by all participants.

Special words of appreciation and congratulations are due to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the ILO Director-General, for his excellent and comprehensive Report on the ILO activities. The themes "social insurance" and "social protection" as selected are most appropriate for discussion at this Conference, and this is for the following reasons.

The ILO has a prominent role in the outlining of social security, especially in the formulation of various related international standards. May I elaborate in brief?

From 1925 to 1940, in various Conventions on compensation for occupational accidents, health insurance, pension insurance, and unemployment insurance, the ILO used its influence to expand participation and the types of programmes.

From 1940 to 1960, defining of ILO policies on social security comprised four aspects: first, risk, such as comprehensive protection against risks for workers, loss of income, medical care, benefits for family; second, improvement of protection for all in alignment of personal and family needs; third, benefits, which should not be excessively high but in alignment with normal living standards and based on defined rights; fourth, payment: appropriate systems of payments for participants. In 1952 the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102) was adopted.

The 1960s saw the birth of new independent countries. Along with development of programmes, new tendencies and techniques for social security, improvements were made and new standards were adopted, including the Employment Injury Benefits Convention (No. 121) and Recommendation (No. 121), both of 1964, and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Convention (No. 120) and Recommendation (No. 131), both adopted in 1967.

At present, almost all countries have their respective programmes for social security, developed industrial as well as developing countries. Although implementation is in accordance with local conditions, general principles as stipulated in ILO Conventions and Recommendations are usually upheld.

Indonesia, commencing with actual economic developments since 1969 with the First Five-Year Plan, achieved increase of production and income for improvement of living standards. Nevertheless, economic growth only is not automatically a guarantee for improvement of prosperity of workers and society. The availability of work opportunities with reasonable income would contribute to the eradication of poverty. But family income could stop, partially or wholly, by death, old age, indemnity, sickness or joblessness. These universal risks should be solved systematically and thoroughly. At present, these risks are usually solved by the Government through the mechanism of social security as an important means for socio-economic policies.

Social security in Indonesia has still a more or less restricted character. For government employees the social insurance programme started even since the pre-independence era, although limited on pension programmes, while for the workers it only started in 1978. After Law No. 3/1992, the system for social security has been supplemented by implementary regulations issued in 1993. The new system provides definite guidelines compulsory for employers and workers, which further ensures satisfactory protection for workers within the limits of company ability to pay. In 1992, Law No. 11/1993 on pension funds was approved, which outlines the voluntary implementation of the pension programme. The two laws in Indonesia are considered as another step of progress for workers' welfare.

In this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, discussions will also be undertaken on the role of ILO in developing technical cooperation among member countries. It is the wish of the Employers' Association of Indonesia that the ILO put more emphasis on its role for the anticipation of problems caused by political and economic structural changes among member enterprises at national, regional and global level.

May I express my opinion that the time has come for the ILO to redefine the priorities for programmes. We acknowledge that the ILO has a most important task to set up labour standards and thereafter monitor their implementation; but, nevertheless, the Indonesian Employers' delegation expects that (with the present global situation in mind) the ILO should pay more attention to programmes for technical cooperation, with emphasis on training and education.

Human investment is a most vital aspect for employers and workers as well, and more so for developing nations, as a significant contribution to development in each country.

In concluding my statement, may I have the privilege to express my wish and expectation for the greatest success of this International Labour Conference.

Original Spanish: Mr. FERNANDEZ (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) – I would like to congratulate the President and the other Officers on their election, which is a guarantee of the effective work of this session of the Conference.

We have read this year's Report of the Director-General. It comprises a detailed analysis of the passage from the social insurance schemes of the beginning of this century through the development of social security to the present day, when we have social protection, at least in the industrialized countries. The Report points out the extreme disparities between the systems in various regions concerning the way to deal with structural questions such as financing, types of benefits and other matters.

The Report notes that the developing countries, where the systems have reached the highest degree of development, are facing major difficulties and that the systems in the underdeveloped countries are insufficient, even at the very basic level.

It goes on to state that "in the next decade or so, better economic growth will enable the developing countries to do a great deal more".

In the conclusions it is suggested that development policies should be introduced in the social security field to give it a more prominent role in national budgets, even if these are modest and are subject to restrictions.

Our prospects do not look good, then. How can we achieve economic expansion, which is the linchpin of the dynamism we so need? How can we reverse the present situation when the major financial institutions, be they the IMF, the Inter-American Development Bank or the World Bank, are imposing policies which are virtually strangling our peoples? These adjustments themselves go beyond mere economic requirements, defining indiscriminate privatization policies which in the medium term will severely weaken these States, transferring the real power to those who have economic power.

Over and above this question of privatization, these imposed policies are interfering with national sovereignty, bringing about fundamental changes. For example, the central banks are gaining power to the point where they no longer will answer to the political powers.

But to return to labour and social security questions, it is tragic to see the dismantling of protective standards for workers. It would appear a new god has been found, namely competitiveness. It is to be fostered at any cost. Any possible measure is acceptable that would allow investors to move with confidence into these markets, just as sure as productivity and low costs will provide them with excellent profitability.

We do not want to criticize the "neo-liberal" school of thought, but rather the excesses which are taking place in this field. In fact what is happening is that some people are trying to undermine the hard-earned rights the working class obtained during more than a century of struggle.

Just when it appeared that a model of working and living conditions had been acknowledged, with a certain degree of job security and legal standards, the clock has been abruptly turned back. Workers' protection is now being attacked under the guise of calls for flexibility, the aim being to turn the worker into a mere factor in the cost of production.

Of course, we are not saying that social policy should not keep up with changes in our modern society. Clearly the workforce must adjust to the new technological reality.

But we cannot accept a situation in which permanent labour contracts are rejected in favour of atypical types of contracts in order to avoid having to make severance payments.

"Labour deregulation", which in its most serious form can even call into question the legal basis of collective bargaining, is another example of something we cannot accept. Similarly, stating that collective agreements alone should regulate working conditions is wrong, as in many underdeveloped countries such as mine there are sectors in which workers cannot in fact unionize.

We can now see that the employers are in fact making efforts to focus on the individual employment contract. The employer considers it a pact among equals. It thus appears that we are going back to the bourgeois concepts of the late eighteenth century. Naturally, this means an attempt to reduce as far as possible union rights and the right to strike.

There are examples of all this within the ILO itself. I should like to mention two concrete ones. First of all, there is the study which was drawn up by the Committee on the Application of Standards concerning systems for the interpretation of Conventions. As we know, this question stems from the disagreement of the employers and some governments with respect to the interpretation of the right to strike, as established by the ILO's specialized bodies.

The second question I would like to mention is the rigid and intransigent stance of the employers who refuse to adopt new international labour Conventions. This position would appear to be based on a premise that, so far as the workers are concerned, progress has come to an end and all that the future holds will benefit the employers.

Of course, my general comments here today apply to the situation in many countries.

Uruguay has been very strict in applying the IMF's formula. The consequence is that the economic policy of our country has had a deep impact on society as a whole due to the fact that we have insufficient pay and a difficult employment situation. These measures also have an impact on health and education.

The monetary institutions' demands boil down to brazen interference through the establishment of conditions which reduce social security benefits and privatize social security systems, depriving social security of a sense of solidarity and embezzling its very purpose.

I would like also to state before concluding that governments must more carefully take into account the opinion of their peoples.

We recently had a referendum in our country, on the basis of which certain legal provisions which would have opened the way to indiscriminate privatization of state services were invalidated.

The outcome of this referendum reflected clear opposition to the socio-economic policy of our Government.

I must now, unfortunately, refer to an unavoidable subject. In 1992, 260 trade union members were killed; 2,500 were arrested because of union activity; and 40,000 people lost their jobs for having sought better working conditions.

We would like to protest against this atrocity and express our solidarity with our fallen brothers and sisters, who fought for fundamental rights: for life, work and liberty.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – Part I of the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection, is of considerable interest, not only because of the information it contains on social security – one of the ILO's most important programmes and a field in which its competency is universally recognized – but also because it illustrates the problems encountered in the practical implementation of the ILO's "message". It is a pity that there was not enough time to submit the Report to a preliminary discussion at national level.

I think, firstly, that on the whole the Report gives us rather an idealistic and optimistic picture. The smooth transition from social insurance to social security and then to social protection unfortunately does not entirely correspond to actual experience. In the most advanced countries we still too often see pockets of poverty that seem immune to social protection measures. The recession obviously accentuates this phenomenon. Furthermore, in many countries the public authorities are compelled to lower the level of certain benefits or to withdraw guarantees that they will maintain their real value in relation to the cost of living. This situation can be explained partly by the inexorable rise in the cost of social protection itself, as a result of unfavourable demographic trends, or skyrocketing health expenditures. But these countries are also asking whether these economic difficulties are not linked to overly ambitious social protection schemes.

Such schemes have to be financed either out of contributions levied on employers and workers, or out of the public treasury. Therefore, they entail higher labour costs, larger compulsory contributions by enterprises and individuals and budget deficits.

ILO standards generally define the level of benefits but do not address their financing. At the time of the Declaration of Philadelphia, or even when the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), was drawn up, the members of the International Labour Conference, practically all of whom came from industrialized countries which were going through a period of economic expansion, might have felt that social security expenses represented transfers and, therefore, had only little influence on growth and competition. Their indifference with respect to the problem of the financing of social security was understandable if not justifiable. Today, we can no longer ignore the effect on the economy, be it positive or negative, of the level and modalities of social protection expenditures. The ILO cannot disregard this debate, even if the working methods of the Conference are hardly suitable to it.

Turning to the developing countries and the countries in transition, too often we find a truly tragic situation. Some countries boast of exemplary legislation which on paper is in line with the most progressive standards. The reality is quite different. The value of benefits is reduced to zero as a result of inflation, and nothing much remains of the contributions paid by enterprises and workers. Administrative costs consume a disproportionate share of resources, when such resources are not misappropriated or embezzled. Corruption replaces the utopia of egalitarianism with unjustified privileges for the wealthy or the politically well-connected. These problems are referred to in the Report, particularly on pages 52 and 53 but with a restraint which is a little too diplomatic and which does not contribute to a much needed greater awareness of the problem.

Another danger that is threatening systems of social protection in developing countries, and perhaps in advanced countries as well, is that the level of contributions and the bureaucratic methods of collection encourage a flight into the informal sector. In many countries fewer and fewer enterprises are having to pay more and more for uncertain benefits. We get into a vicious circle which ruins both the enterprises and the social security system without providing true guarantees for the workers.

What instruments does the ILO have for helping member States, employers and workers?

We have Conventions, and a fundamental text in Convention No. 102. The Director-General himself notes on page 41 of the Report that the level of ratification is very limited. He attributes this partly to technical reasons. The Committee on the Application of Standards should identify the specific reasons so that the Conference can adopt the necessary changes that will lead to the ratification and application of these texts, in other words, make them applicable.

The Director-General adds that other governments have refrained from ratifying because of the shortcomings and failings of their social security systems. But it is precisely these shortcomings and failings that we have to get at. We have to help member States to find a social security system that will provide the greatest degree of true guarantees for workers, taking into account the economic implications of the methods and levels adopted, and the possible backfiring of some well-intentioned measures on economic growth, and thus on employment.

I am well aware that the Social Security Department and the ILO experts in the field are devoting themselves to this task. But I do not think that they can base themselves, in the advice they give, exclusively on Conventions. Naturally they have their own personal experience and their knowledge of the systems of the different countries and the way they are applied in practice. Apart from the rather superficial discussions in regional meetings or in the less frequent meetings of experts which do not have a political mandate, they scarcely have any directives that represent an ILO doctrine. There is no model of social security because it is necessary to take account, not only of the level of development, but also of national administrative capacity and traditions. It would, for instance, be premature to give up certain traditions and forms of solidarity which have managed, here and there, to survive urbanization.

Therefore, I cannot but support some of the Director-General's proposals, such as his warning against the idea, and I quote "that systems established in the developed countries can or should be replicated in the developing world". It is also correct, and I quote "to review social protection policies in the context of overall development policies, and to integrate them into the general development strategy". However, to say that neither full employment nor economic prosperity is a sine qua non for social protection is perhaps true in theory, but it could be dangerous if it were to encourage those responsible to ignore the real dangers to economic prosperity and employment of certain social protection measures or certain methods of financing whose final effect might be entirely opposite to the objectives sought.

It is therefore not enough to propose, as our Conventions do, desirable levels of protection which seem to lie beyond the grasp of a large number of member States. We also have to help member States to work out the parameters which will permit governments and the social partners to develop systems taking into account the economic and social requirements and allowing for an optimum use of inevitably limited resources. This is not something suitable for the kind of standard-setting procedures we are accustomed to using at the Conference; new methods are needed and we must find them.

In that sense, this discussion goes beyond the issue of social protection. It requires us to think about the means at our disposal for achieving the ILO's objectives. Standards are a means, but not the only one. This is a subject we will have to come back to.

Mr. MOTSA (Minister for Labour and Public Service, Swaziland) – It is indeed a great honour and privilege once again to have the opportunity of addressing this august assembly, on my own behalf and that of the delegation of the Kingdom of Swaziland.

I bring the Director-General and the distinguished delegates at this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference greetings and good wishes from our Head of State, His Majesty, King Mswati III, and from the people of Swaziland.

Allow me to take this opportunity of congratulating the President and the other officers on his election to perform such a formidable task. There is no doubt that with your competence, wisdom and judgement, this august assembly will achieve fruitful and meaningful conclusions.

The Kingdom of Swaziland remains under the leadership of His Majesty the King. His Majesty is committed to the social and economic improvement of his subjects and the country as a whole, while maintaining and strengthening the traditional cultural values which have helped to make the Swazi people a peace-loving nation.

Like many parts of the world Swaziland has continued to experience serious unemployment resulting from the deep economic recession which has affected the world. It, as a land-locked, agricultural country, has had to endure the effects of a very serious drought. These effects have aggravated a spate of retrenchments and the complete shutdown of many of our industries. To redress the situation, His Majesty's Government has made tireless efforts to attract investment by other nations in order to open up more large, labour-intensive businesses. We continue to make this appeal in the hope that those who have been made redundant will once again enjoy a decent wage with which to support their families.

Few changes have been made in labour legislation, although a study is currently being carried out with a view to harmonizing all our labour laws so as to bring them into line with social and economic requirements. A report by the Review Commission, which is tripartite in composition, is expected in a month's time.

The country has experienced a number of wildcat strikes and threatened lockouts due, in most cases, to the inability of employers and employees to deal with their grievances within the existing statutory framework. In some cases, it has been established that even employers' and employees' organizations were ill-equipped to assist their members in settling their disputes peacefully.

Parliament has therefore imposed a responsibility on the Government to take steps to increase awareness of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Employment Acts. These two pieces of legislation set out what can be regarded as the acceptable standard of behaviour by the social partners. The Government has accordingly set aside a sum of E150,000 for the education of workers and employers on their rights and obligations under the labour laws.

A tripartite planning committee consisting of workers, employers and Government representatives has been appointed to plan and coordinate this programme. Although it started late last year, it was able to run the following courses: dispute handling and collective bargaining; the role of the shop steward; union funds; the role of the members of the wages council; dispute handling; labour inspection; the role of the social partners.

I am happy to say that my Government will continue to fund this programme during the current year.

It was noted that the Department of Labour suffered from an acute transport shortage. Some of the regions, and some sections of the Department, have never had any transport facilities, although the nature of their operations requires them. The Department had only ten vehicles. It now has 21, of which two were donated by the ILO/DANIDA project and nine were purchased out of Government funds. It is expected that these acquisitions will greatly improve the mobility of the labour offices, with the result that problems will be dealt with before they develop into crises.

In Swaziland, there is a renewed interest in fundamental human rights at the workplace. They include the right to a safe and healthy working environment. There is a growing awareness that without safety and health at work, social justice cannot be achieved and that safety and health at work is fundamental to economic development.

We in Swaziland are pleased to note a number of clear trends which have emerged in recent years and which can further guide our activities in the field of occupational safety and health. Firstly, there is a move towards a long-term strategy to promote the participation of all the social partners. This has been made possible by the help of the ILO through the project "Strengthening the factories inspectorate" funded by DANIDA. We are very grateful to our Danish friends and the Danish Government for this remarkable assistance.

Secondly, an effort is being made to extend protection, concentrating on priority areas where safety and health is particularly important and where the number of workers at risk is large. An example of this is the construction industry, which includes road and building construction and has had the highest number of industrial accidents. This is one of the areas where we are concentrating our campaign in health and safety.

Thirdly, there is a clear focus on the role of training and information in mobilizing local resources for implementing an effective strategy in these priority areas. In Swaziland, we have learned in setting safety and health priorities that our action is successful when we concentrate on practical improvements that can be achieved by mobilizing local resources. This has led us to the conviction that local people – managers, workers and safety and health professionals – are best motivated to implement these practical improvements when they are given the chance to work together to achieve specific goals using local materials.

Our determination to tackle these issues stems from the gritty reality that 33 workers were killed at work in 1992 and over 800 injured, and a number maimed and disabled for life. These figures are no different from those of previous years in a working population of about 200,000.

There is a strong need to establish a legal framework to cover the entire working population, with clearly defined roles for the Government, employers and workers. We have to admit that many workers in small-scale enterprises and in the rural and informal sectors remain unprotected. Particular attention needs to be paid to those working in hazardous conditions, for instance in asbestos mines, and various vulnerable groups of workers on the farm and estates, particularly with regards to the handling of farm chemicals and pesticides.

May I assure this Conference that occupational health and safety will remain a top priority issue for my Ministry and the Government of Swaziland.

Finally, may I conclude by conveying my Government's appreciation for the valuable assistance which my Ministry continues to receive from the Office of the Director-General including the Regional Office.

In particular, I would like to register my Government's appreciation of the invaluable assistance given to my country by the African Regional Labour Administration Centre (ARLAC). In the last three years, ARLAC has given Swaziland US$5,000 for organizing tripartite seminars at national level. The aim of such seminars is to improve collective bargaining and promote the tripartite relationship. The Regional Office has always cooperated with us by providing technical assistance where it is needed, and continues to do so.

The Factories Inspectorate staff and labour inspectors, including the rank of the commissioners of labour, continue to get places in seminars, workshops and symposia provided by ARLAC.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – The Report on Social insurance and social protection presented by the Director-General to this year's session highlights the impressive development which has taken place in all regions of the world during the present century, particularly since the end of the Second World War, in the expansion and consolidation of the concept of social welfare. It draws a distinction between the comprehensive "welfare state" systems painstakingly built up in industrialized countries where the early schemes of social insurance designed to protect workers and their families against social hazards, chiefly old age, sickness and unemployment, gradually evolved into more comprehensive social security schemes, providing universal coverage, underpinned by an impressive degree of solidarity between the generations. In turn, the concept of social security in these countries was further expanded to encompass a framework of social protection which provides a solid base of social support for all citizens not necessarily dependent on their contributions or their employment history.

The success of the industrialized countries in implanting such an ambitious welfare structure owed much no doubt not only to the general political and social consensus within their societies which expressed itself in a remarkable degree of solidarity, but also to the fact that these countries throughout this period were experiencing significant economic growth.

In the developing countries, although the political desire for similar welfare structures has not been lacking – inspired certainly by the various international declarations and ILO Conventions and Recommendations – the means were generally lacking to construct similar systems, nor were the basic social and economic requirements available.

With a considerable informal sector slipping through the tax net, massive unemployment, erratic or negative economic growth, and the absence of stable and democratic political structures, the essential social consensus in favour of a redistribution of income through a combined tax and benefit structure could not be attained.

Another category of countries are those engaged in the transition from a planned economy to a market-oriented economy. These countries face a particularly difficult process because of the scale and speed with which change is taking place. From a system of state-guaranteed employment they have to develop a safety net to provide a minimum income for those losing their jobs as a result of economic restructuring. The problem is that there will be too many unemployed and too few viable employers and employees.

Even in the first group of countries to which I have referred, namely Western industrialized countries, new signs of strain threatening the all-important social consensus have begun to emerge in recent years. These have mainly to do with demographic trends particularly an ageing population as well as high and persistent levels of unemployment and decelerating economic growth.

The combined effect of these factors is bound to create increased demand for support and benefits at a time when contributions and tax revenues are in decline.

This problem has already prompted the European Commission to embark on a study which, according to reports, will not only examine the state of competitiveness of the European Community vis-à-vis the rest of the industrialized world but will also tackle the sensitive question of whether the Community's welfare state policies may be contributing to low growth, rising unemployment and the inability to create new jobs in sufficient numbers. In this context, the recent decision by the German industrial lobbies to oppose the Government's plans for a new social insurance surcharge to finance a 13 billion deutschmark programme to provide residential care for the chronically sick and the elderly assumes a certain significance. Opponents described the proposals as a direct threat to jobs and investment.

Let me now turn to the situation in my country, Malta. Before the Second World War, Malta was still a British colony. There was no social security system except for pensions and sickness covering government employees and a workmen's compensation scheme providing very limited protection against injury at work. After the war the first step in the construction of a social welfare system was taken through the enactment of the Old Age Pensions Act, 1948. This provided for income support, based on a means test for retired persons and was financed out of general tax revenues.

In 1956, under a system of local self-government, a national insurance scheme was introduced on a contributory basis with employees, employers and the State, each making equal contributions at a flat rate to the National Insurance Fund. Benefits included coverage for sickness, unemployment, retirement, employment injury, widowhood and invalidity. Medical care and hospitalization were available free or at subsidized rates under a separate system.

During the same year, the National Assistance Act was passed by Parliament which provided income support, irrespective of age, to households with inadequate incomes. It also provided for free medical aid and financial assistance to specified categories of chronically sick and handicapped persons. Again these benefits were generally means tested and financed out of general tax revenues.

Amendments were also introduced over the years to the National Insurance Scheme which, in 1965, was extended to cover the self-employed as well as, on a voluntary basis, individuals not gainfully occupied.

The National Insurance Scheme remained fully funded, with contributions and benefits all at flat rates until 1979 when retirement and survivors' benefits became earnings-related and contributions were levied on a graduated income-related basis equivalent to one-twelfth of the basic wage payable by employers, workers and the State, with the self-employed contributing one-eighth of their income – but always subject to a maximum ceiling.

The funding concept was abandoned at the same time and replaced by a "pay as you go" system. This was due to the fact that the National Insurance Fund had been allowed to run down completely.

In 1987, the three basic Acts, namely the Old Age Pensions Act, 1948, the National Assistance Act, 1956, and the National Insurance Act, 1956, were incorporated into a single Act – the Social Security Act, 1987. This amalgamation blurred the hitherto clear demarcation between the benefits payable under the National Insurance Scheme, which were essentially based on the individual's contribution record, and other benefits based on a means test which had always been financed out of general tax revenues.

A singular and insidious feature of Malta's compulsory national insurance scheme, as amended in 1979 and which remains in force to this day, concerns retirement pensions.

The law provides that retirement pensions should amount to two-thirds of the average earnings prior to retirement, always subject to a specified maximum. However, it also provides that any pension received from the employer is deducted from the national insurance pension. The result inevitably was that all private pension schemes have been liquidated. Thus, the burden of all retirement pensions has fallen on the National Insurance Account and there is a continuing disincentive for private pension schemes which could relieve some of this burden.

Partly as a result of this, the "Social Security Account", published annually by the Government, shows an ever widening so-called "welfare gap", defined as the difference between receipts from national insurance contributions and all items of expenditure on social security, with the deficit met out of general revenue.

Employers find it difficult to accept the concept of the welfare gap as described by the Government. In particular, it is not clear why, whereas all receipts under the account relate exclusively to national insurance contributions, the expenditure side includes not only contribution-related benefits but all non-contributory payments provided under the former Old Age Pensions and National Insurance Acts, as well as considerable sums for hospitals, health and care for the elderly.

Recently, worried over the forecast trends resulting mainly from an ageing population, the Government has prompted a national debate concerning the sustainability of the present system over the long term. Suggestions floated have included raising the pension age as well as contribution rates. With regard to the latter, this year has seen the contribution payable by employers rising from 8.33 per cent of basic wages to 10 per cent – an increase of 20 per cent. All three social partners are currently engaged on this debate.

Employers in Malta welcome the opportunity provided by Government to participate actively in the ongoing debate concerning the future of the social security system in Malta. Indeed, my association was among the first to call attention to the distorted picture presented by the so-called welfare gap, in particular with reference to the virtual prohibition of private pension schemes and no possibility of partial opting out from the State's two-thirds earnings-related pension scheme.

We as employers strongly believe that this debate could benefit from the expert and disinterested advice that the ILO, with its vast knowledge and expertise in this field, could contribute. We feel the ILO should assume a leading role in guiding the social partners in their endeavours to achieve lasting solutions.

Another important item on this year's agenda is part-time work. Although part-time work in Malta is still relatively low in a situation of full employment, it is foreseen that in common with other countries an expansion is likely. At present, the total number of part-time employees is evenly divided between those who have part-time employment in addition to a regular full-time job, and those whose sole occupation is part-time employment. Both categories together account for about 10 per cent of the workforce.

Together with other Employers' delegates, we still believe that the subject does not necessitate a Convention and that a Recommendation would be more suitable. Looking at the proposed Convention, we fully associate ourselves with the stand of the IOE that any international standards with regard to part-time work will inevitably result in the over-regulation of and rigidities in the labour market with all their negative effects.

Original French: Mr. LEBRUN (Workers' delegate, Haiti) – I would like to join the previous speakers, on behalf of the Haitian trade union organizations to which the Haitian Workers' Confederation belongs, to offer our sincere congratulations to the President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election. My congratulations also go to Mr. Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of that tripartite parliament, the International Labour Office.

Haitian workers expect much from this new mandate, and believe that the reforms undertaken will re-energize this distinguished institution, although the end of the cold war and the insane competition between the big blocs may compromise the mission and even sign away its future.

As every delegation knows, this year the Report of the Director-General focuses on Social Insurance and Social Protection. This Report has enabled everyone of us in the partnership to reflect on the big challenges posed by social protection in the light of the increasing impoverishment of the working class. For some countries, especially those of the North, this inalienable right represented by social security is no longer a claim but rather a tradition that workers enjoy legally. However, in many countries of the South social security remains a myth, and a source of corruption from which political leaders line their pockets.

Before I describe the situation of social protection in my country, Haiti, may I remind you of the context in which we live. After 30 years of the Duvalier's dictatorship, its collapse in 1986 allowed workers and their organizations, through constant struggles, to acquire certain social, economic, civil and political rights. This democratic wind was quickly done away with. Since the coup d'état of 30 September 1991 which overthrew the democratically elected president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, after seven months in office, Haiti fell back into the hands of those who were eager for power. Oppression is a daily occurrence and enormous exactions are made on the whole population.

Against this background, when the fundamental rights of workers are trampled underfoot, it is clear that the institution that should take charge of the social security system is inoperative: it is one of the "milch cows" in fact of the civil and military leaders and this has always been the case, from the macoute regime to the present day. Despite the assistance of the ILO since 1988 and the study and the project it proposed, which was put to our Ministry of Social Affairs, nothing has changed and everything remains a dead letter. A real source of corruption, the social security regime of Haiti, ONA/OFATMA, could not be transformed into viable institutions in a few years. However, we must all admit that with unstable, unpopular, unlawful and, moreover, iniquitous governments, which violate the most basic right of workers, nothing positive can be achieved for the benefit of workers. Since the coup d'état of 30 September 1991, workers have lost not only the right of assembly and to assert their other rights, to contest working conditions which are often inhuman, claim just wages and to celebrate their holidays, but they have also lost the right to live in a free, democratic society that respects social justice.

Will our cries finally be heard? Are we truly the only ones responsible for our situation? Who is now manipulating our destiny? And why are workers and the whole of the population direct victims of this heavy burden represented by the economic blockade? It is true that an embargo applied and respected by governments in accordance with their commitment and their decision could have overturned the organizers of the coup. But what has happened? The embargo has had no effect except to impoverish the workers and the people, and also to enrich the rich. More than 100 enterprises have closed their doors, and more than 200,000 workers have lost their jobs in 21 months, as if unemployment in Haiti was not already high enough. Totally destitute, many Haitians are condemned to flee to other countries, to America or Europe, to escape repression. For today, Haitians, when fleeing the country, risk their lives on clandestine voyages in unsafe vessels. Thousands have been drowned and almost 45,000 have been intercepted at sea and turned back.

Three days after the coup d'état of September 1991, the Confederation of Haitian Workers, like all the other trade union organizations in the country, condemned the coup and demanded a return to constitutional order. Then the workers and especially the political and trade union leaders were imprisoned, and some were tortured, for their affiliation or for their political beliefs. Some were also obliged to leave the country while others agreed to stay although running enormous risks simply through being militant workers, active in a trade union organization or a political party. The right of expression and belief is disregarded and activists in the media are one of the main targets of the de facto authorities. Many journalists are still persecuted and have to go into hiding for fear of reprisals. Many papers and radio stations have been ransacked and closed while those that remain active are subjected to draconian controls. The civil population, men, women and children without distinction, are not spared this wave of violence. Summary executions, arbitrary arrests, abuse, intimidation and threats, unauthorized searches and vandalism mean that the Haitian people live in anxiety but still retain the hope of a speedy return to a state based on law, and a return to constitutional order.

Every year thousands of government, employers' and workers' delegates meet in this tripartite parliament to analyse the report of the Director-General, evaluate the application of standards and work on draft Recommendations and Conventions which subsequently will be left to the good will of the deliberations of our respective governments for ratification. Some delegations will shortly see their efforts crowned not only with the ratification of Conventions in their countries, but also with the will to respect their application. For other delegates, for lack of a clear will to built a pluralist, democratic society, stamped with social justice, their struggle will continue, and they will come back every year to Geneva to listen to the appeals to their governments either because of violations of ratified conventions, or for recommendations to be ratified or applied.

In just a year the ILO will celebrate 75 years of existence. Haiti as a founder member has always been treated as a poor relation. Convinced as I am that the right to develop constitutes one of the central pillars for the building of a society in which social, economic, cultural, civil and political rights are respected, the general discussion of this 80th Session has engaged my attention in particular. My presence in the Committee on Technical Cooperation shows the interest which the Haitian trade union movements, and my organization in particular, attaches to better staffing and to effective, integrated cooperation, inter alia through assistance from the ILO. In view of the importance of the right to development and the context in which my country is developing, may I refer to a passage from a proposal drafted with CECOTRET-CSC, the Swiss Workers' delegation, and addressed to our working group, and I quote "there can be no unique pre-established model and this implies that authentic development requires self-determination of peoples, recognition of their sovereignty over their natural resources and wealth, and full respect for their cultural identity; (...) this process requires the active and conscious participation of individuals and groups in the adoption of decisions at every stage from determination of objectives and the means to attain them to the application of these means and the evaluation of the results".

Haitian workers are convinced that the country can emerge from this misery. However, in view of the disastrous political, economic and social situation of Haiti, we may well wonder about the future. This is why we appeal to the decision-makers of the great powers to give us the means of finding a peaceful and definitive solution to our crisis. Or let us seek a solution ourselves in which there will be neither conquerors nor conquered, but at least a solution from which the country and its people will benefit.

We do not want the spectre of the Sahel to hover over us; we reject any invasion or new occupation of our country. For what would that mean?

We are fighting every day for all human rights and fundamental liberties to be respected in Haiti. In the name of the rights of the Haitian trade union organizations and my organization in particular, we condemn the breakdown of the democratic process on 30 September brought about by the coup d'état. We equally condemn the embargo as a political influence incapable of ensuring a return to constitutional order and democracy. We denounce the time-wasting of international bodies and their hypocrisy in seeking viable and definitive solutions for the return of the democratically-elected President Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

My organization reaffirms, in order to break the chains of the oppressor's yoke, the resolutions of these national councils concerning the necessity and urgency of bringing all sectors of national life around the negotiation table for a national debate so as to bring the country out of the crisis which has lasted all too long.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the Tunisian General Labour Union and on my own behalf, I have pleasure in offering the President and Vice-Presidents my warmest congratulations on the confidence placed in them by all the delegations participating in the Conference. I am sure that the proceeding of this historic session will be crowned with success under your leadership. I also take this opportunity to thank the Director-General, Mr Michel Hansenne, for his excellent Report and to congratulate him on his reelection as executive head of the International Labour Office. I wish him every success in his work. We shall stand by him in all his efforts to secure observance of the Organization's lofty principles and to promote the well-being of all workers throughout the world.

The subject of the Report of the Director-General to this session is well chosen, since it is one of the foremost concerns of workers and the international trade union movement. The matter of social insurance and social protection for workers is absolutely vital, a top priority at the present time and counts as a basic human right. The Report rightly notes the inviolability of the right to social security and the need to link the extension of social coverage with economic, social and political development in the developing countries. In doing so, it is merely reiterating the principles that led to its foundation in 1919 and that underlie all subsequent international instruments, in particular the Declaration of Philadephia and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

The Report contains a detailed review of the situation in the Third World and an array of facts and statistics that provide food for serious thought on a situation that has become desperate. Millions of people are suffering from hunger, poverty, lack of health care and illiteracy. One-third of the world's population are without access to clean drinking water, roughly half are without proper health care and last year 33 million children died of diseases contracted from unsafe drinking water. There are 1,800 million people in the Third World with no access to health services and 1,300 million living under the poverty line. These figures from the Report of the Director-General move us to deep reflection on this tragic situation and incite us to take radical action at both the national and international levels.

The picture needs to be changed completely. As the twentieth century draws to a close, a century of changes that transformed the face of the earth, mankind cannot continue to allow half of its number to live in inhuman conditions. Compulsory social coverage is the basic prerequisite for the social justice to which we aspire. In a unipolar world based on the market economy, cut-throat competition, the supremacy of the profit motive and the withdrawal of the State from the field of social services, we cannot stand by and allow the social sphere to be turned into a market ruled by brute force, in other words the law of the jungle. The human need for work should not imply turning workers into easy prey for employers, especially multinational enterprises that seek to make profit at the expense of workers, even if it means depriving them of basic social coverage.

I wish to take this opportunity to appeal to all trade union organizations and to governments to take steps to have social coverage made a precondition for all investment projects. What we are seeing today is multinational companies exploiting the investment needs of many Third World countries to limit social rights and hence social protection. Solidarity among workers, both in the North and in the South, is the only way of thwarting the aims of these companies, which have gained ground at the expense of the rights acquired painstakingly by workers in the course of a century.

I also wish to take this opportunity to review the situation in my country. My organization, the Tunisian General Labour Union, has been fighting since the 1940s for the extension of social protection to all workers and other social groups. We view social protection as a basic prerequisite for social well-being. My organization, which suffered constraint and oppression under the previous regime, which imprisoned and tortured its leaders, is today operating in an environment that guarantees trade union rights, general and individual freedoms and human rights thanks to the historic change that occurred in Tunisia in 1987, the symbol of which is the existence today of democratic rights and freedoms which we support spontaneously and wholeheartedly.

I can say without hesitation that we have made great headway along the path of democracy in spite of the brevity of our experience and the fact that social protection is used by some parties as a basic element in commercial competition between different countries. What Tunisian workers hope for, in spite of our presence on the boards of management of the Social Security Funds, is stronger participation for workers' representatives in formulating the policies of the funds and determining their areas of operation.

We feel that the time has come for those who finance the social security funds to supervise their activities and ensure that they operate in such a way as to achieve urgent social objectives. We also consider that the tendency to backpedal on social rights and achievements must be vigorously opposed, especially in the area of social insurance and social protection. My organization has assigned top priority to the task of challenging every move that threatens workers' rights and achievements in the field of social protection. I take this opportunity to call on the International Labour Organization to serve as a technical support structure for its member organizations, especially in the light of the prevailing social situation worldwide and the emergence of new phenomena that threaten social protection such as job flexibility, casual work and the increase in the number of workers in the informal sector.

I also wish to take this opportunity to commend the ILO's efforts in such fields as job training, improving working conditions, the protection of migrant workers and social protection and the special role it is playing on behalf of workers who are more vulnerable than their fellows – I refer to our brothers and sisters in the occupied Arab territories, black workers in South Africa labouring under the yoke of apartheid and workers in countries suffering under an economic embargo or political disturbances.

We are sure that the resolutions adopted by this historic session will be a valuable contribution to the welfare of workers and will help to improve their working conditions, to foster social justice, to guarantee the human dignity of workers, to enable them to participate actively in social and economic life and to move forward on the part of social democracy in such a way as to forge a better future for mankind.

Original Spanish: Mr. TEJADA OLARTE (Employers' delegate, Panama) – Firstly, I would like to congratulate the President and the three Vice-Presidents of this 80th Session of the Conference, under whose direction and leadership I am sure we will be able to achieve our objectives. I would also extend our congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne on his well-deserved re-election as Director-General.

On behalf of the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama (CONEP), I would like to express many thanks for this opportunity to speak to this Conference during the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, which I read very carefully and with great interest.

The prevention of major industrial accidents has been a subject of permanent concern for employers because such tragedies lead to regrettable losses of human life, or irreparable physical damage to the persons concerned; in many cases also they can lead to considerable damage to the environment. These consequences are more important and significant to us than the material losses that the industrial installations might suffer, however great those might be.

We are convinced that the progress of technology and the rapid growth of industrial installations make it absolutely necessary, not only to adjust, but also to increase the measures for accident prevention. The ideal situation would be for every industrial installation to have infallible methods, systems and resources that would protect them with absolute certainty against mishaps. In reality, however, this objective is impossible to achieve. That is why we are here, discussing this complex subject, and hoping to reach conclusions that will enable us to enhance our capacity to prevent these tragic events in industrial establishments.

On the subject of part-time work (first discussion), the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama duly replied to the questionnaire sent out by the Office in 1992.

We have no doubt that this subject will lead to great controversy during the discussions at this Conference, but we hope that the final documents produced by this discussion will not be so strict or inflexible so as to prevent employers and workers from temporarily adapting certain conditions in their respective enterprises, in times of acute crisis, with a view to ensuring survival of the enterprise and of jobs.

As regards the role of the ILO in technical cooperation (general discussion), as a representative of Panamanian employers I have to express our pleasure in seeing that this Organization remains committed to all aspects of vocational training by promoting new programmes at world and regional level. In the light of this interest, the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama supports the initiative taken by the Panamanian Government formally to request the ILO, through the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, to establish in Panama the headquarters of the new regional office for Central America, Mexico, Haiti, the Dominican Republic and, of course, Panama. In this connection, we would like to be able to count on the support of our Latin American brothers present at this Conference.

We hope that the conclusions of each Committee at this 80th Session will be enshrined in documents based on clear and objective formulas that can be implemented in practice, so that they can be adopted and applied, both in highly developed countries and in developing countries, taking into account their limited possibilities in the fields of technology, education and economic and human resources. In the final analysis what really matters is not the number of new Conventions and Recommendations, but the number of instruments that are ratified and implemented by each member State.

Before concluding, I would like to refer to the President's inaugural speech when he said, and I quote: "I would not be exaggerating if I said (...) that the future of mankind in the twenty-first century will to a large extent will depend on the response of the international community represented by various forums, including this Conference." He also suggested that it is imperative, and I quote: "to provide more work opportunities, enhance employment and contain unemployment". These ideas contain well-intentioned objectives. Nevertheless we feel that the reality that we are living is different, because the orientation of the new international economic order is imposed by the rich countries as a function of their own interests; it is in this way that they promulgate economic openness and the liberalization of export markets but domestically they reaffirm their protectionist and monopolistic practices. In this respect we have to express our concern with respect to the new regulation of the EEC (No. 404-93, of 13 February 1993), which restricts the banana market to the detriment of our country. Bananas for Panama represent 50 per cent of our exports of goods, and 50 per cent of paid employment in the agricultural areas. The effects of this new regulation against the entry of Panamanian fruit to the markets of the EEC will have serious and harmful effects on employment levels and the volume of our exports. Furthermore, we have no appropriate substitute to banana plantations. The establishment of quotas that are lower than the normal levels and the prohibitive and discriminatory tariff increases by France, Spain, Italy, the United Kingdom, Portugal and Luxembourg, for us are a clear demonstration of protectionism and monopolies, which are contrary to the principles of mutual cooperation, social justice, the promotion of employment and the common welfare as proclaimed by the ILO to all member States.

We appeal to the spirit of solidarity and brotherhood of the friendly countries represented at this Conference, asking them to support our just claims, and to demand that the EEC suspend this new regulation against banana imports.

We trust therefore that this 80th Session of the Conference will reaffirm the objectives of peace, social justice and the promotion of employment. I conclude reiterating my wishes for success.

Original Spanish: Mr. OBREGON SABOGAL (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – On behalf of the delegation of Colombian workers, we offer our congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to their responsible posts at this tripartite assembly.

Violence continues unabated in Colombia. Since the past session of the Conference the trade union movement has recorded 270 murders of its leaders, activists and members. Already 13,000 comrades have been killed in the six long years of existence of the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia.

In addition to the physical disappearance of our leaders, which I denounce with the anguished vehemence of a trade union movement which wishes to remain in existence, there is the clear and open persecution of our people fighting for social progress under the Colombian justice system, which makes popular activities subject to the criminal legislation introduced to combat the terrorism of organized crime, drug trafficking, and armed rebellion.

Now we are not just burying our comrades who have fallen in this absurd violence. The prisons of Colombia are becoming meeting places for trade unions because our leaders are all ending up there and prosecuted for their social activities.

Fourteen trade unionists have been in prison since February for having organized, participated in, and led a strike in the telecommunications enterprise. Trade union leaders in the oil industry, the civil aviation authority, the National Registry, banks and various public service enterprises are all being prosecuted for trade union activities.

As if this were not enough, the national Government has declared illegal all strikes and stoppages by workers as in the case of the successful national strike of Colombian teachers in defence of public education. Furthermore, the Colombian Government is accepting no form of social consensus. By prosecuting those who fight for social progress and declaring trade union activities illegal, the Government is silencing the protests of the people.

The Director-General of the ILO has included in his Report the theme of social insurance and social protection. This is now the epicentre of discussions in the developing countries as attempts are being made to introduce changes which will have a profound effect on the future of social security for present and future generations.

This is a complex topic in which technology and politics come together. The experience and technical, scientific and professional expertise of the ILO in the study of matters relating to the world of work make it an impartial body which can advise the developing countries in their search for a comprehensive social security system.

This is why our organization asked the Government to request an ILO technical mission, a mission which was frustrated when it was seriously threatened and prevented from talking with workers and with the Congress of the Republic. We workers reiterate our solidarity with the ILO and the technical mission in respect of what happened during its visit to our country.

However, tripartism, which is the essence of our Organization, must cease to be merely praise-worthy rhetoric and be put into practice. In ILO relations there must be no social components with different ranks. Governments, employers and workers have identical rights to the services provided by our Organization.

We believe that social security is the only means of rationalizing production and, as the United Nations has said, to make a development a constant increase in the welfare of the whole population on the basis of their full participation in the process of development and in a fair distribution of the benefits thereof.

As the defenders of labour as a prototype of human dignity, we workers have questioned the image which sells rich living and reproduces the consumerism of the market. The large social utopias are being supplanted by the regulatory pragmatism of the big multinational chains of power.

The debate on social security, which is fundamentally technical and scientific, cannot be separate from social and ethical legitimacy. Let us recall the questioning since the end of the nineteenth century of the belief that freedom and equality were essential individual rights, a reflection of the law of supply and demand.

The struggle of the working classes demonstrated the crisis of individual rights, and the profound injustice caused by interpreting equality and freedom in terms of competition. This is what gave rise to the concept of social rights as a mechanism for balancing existing forces in the various social areas, a principle which has been made a reality and the fundamental component of which is social security.

Human fraternity and social solidarity are a duty and a principle. Humanity realizes that it is man who needs and deserves security and that it is by a common effort within a reciprocal framework of social responsibility that we should seek a solution with the dedicated protection of the State.

The establishment of a social welfare State cannot take as its model the savage exploitation and social deterioration of the neo-liberal view. A national selection of the market is being imposed to ensure the survival of the most competitive with the greatest capacity to save.

There is a clear contradiction between the call for solidarity as an abstract principle which seeks to preserve individual interests and monopolies, and the dismantling of social policies, the reduction of public expenditure and the promotion of individualism devoid of any human meaning.

In Colombia the Government is seeking at all costs to impose individual savings as a pension system, administrated by private profit-making funds. This system does away with generational, regional, social and economic solidarity and promotes individualism, which accelerates and creates enormous social conflicts, unmanageable social costs, destabilizes the political order, increases the external debt, undermines the unity and universality of benefits and does away with social service institutions.

This is the case of the Social Security Institute of Colombia, which is viewed by the Office of the Comptroller General as an efficient body because of its large pension reserves and the provision of invaluable health services to a large percentage of the population. However, the Government is trying to dismantle it, despite the intelligent and feisty struggle of the National Union of Social Security Workers and the whole trade union movement in Colombia.

The lack of solidarity in private schemes thwarts any principle of transfer among groups, regions and social sectors of unequal levels of development, a situation which has a totally negative effect on the redistribution of income and national participation in the GDP.

The privatization of social security is the most absurd historical regression in social policy, for it transforms it into a private insurance which denies the very philosophy of social protection and prevents the proper application of the principles of efficiency, universality and solidarity.

Latin American employers, especially the representatives of speculative financial capital, have signalled their disagreement with the ILO which has demonstrated that a private savings financing mechanism is not only different, but contrary to a social security system.

Governments and neo-liberal businessmen, as is the case in Colombia, are trying to change social security into the financial deal of the century, leaving the great masses submerged in social marginalization.

The ILO seeks social justice and cannot compromise itself in the defence of private financial interests. We express our solidarity with and recognition of the ILO for its vision of social security, especially in the cases of Chile and Colombia.

Social security is the main route to peace. Peace cannot be achieved where human beings cannot satisfy their basic needs. For our organization peace can be achieved through solidarity. The Catholic Church has said that peace in the world depends on solidarity among poor people themselves, among the rich and the poor, among workers themselves and among employers and workers, and between nations and peoples.

We defend solidarity against the onslaught of individualism so that we might achieve a real social security, which is the guarantee of peace.

(Mr. Abdel-Hak takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. LAZO PERALTA (Workers' delegate, Peru) – On behalf of the workers of Peru, its trade unions and the trade union confederation which I represent, I would like to say what an honour it is to speak to you here at this Conference. First of all, I would like to add to the congratulations of other delegates on the election of the President and the re-election of Mr. Hansenne as Director-General. Above all, I would like to thank Mr. Hansenne for having chosen the subject of social security and social protection for this year's Report, because today in my country it is being eliminated and privatized, thus bringing to an end the tripartite solidarity between both sides of industry and the Government.

One year ago in this international labour forum, my compatriot, Pedro Huilca, denounced the deplorable employment situation in Peru. However, his protest has not been given the attention it deserved, perhaps because it openly called into question the neo-liberal system which is being forced upon us in Peru today.

Today, Pedro Huilca is dead and buried. He was assassinated in front of his house and in front of his wife and children, a victim of the irrational violence inherent in the culture of death which is taking over our nation.

The working class remains the principal victim of the neo-liberal policies pursued by our Government with the blessing of national and transnational employers. The Peruvian Government is callously and obsequiously implementing the programme of economic adjustment and national restructuring designed and imposed by the IMF. This has had the immediate effect of pushing more than 60 per cent of the population into desperate poverty.

And yet, in 1992, Peru paid more than $900 million to service its foreign debt. This year, the amount will be $1.2 billion. This is unacceptable for a country faced with crisis, whose exports account for only about $4 billion a year.

Unemployment and underemployment are worsening. Paradoxically, this situation is being exacerbated by the State which is actually investing money in promoting it in order to facilitate the privatization of its enterprises and divert funds to debt servicing. The minimum salary has been frozen for more than two years and prices are still increasing, with inflation of over 20 per cent in the last five months. The manufacturing system is virtually paralysed and companies are closing down at an alarming pace, throwing more and more workers on to the street daily. The recession is strangling the national economy.

In parallel with this, the Government since coming to power has been systematically developing an anti-labour policy, passing a welter of provisions to impose conditions on and eliminate the labour rights acquired over more than 50 years, and thereby ignoring constitutional guarantees and ILO Conventions. As a result, workers have been appealing to the courts and sending documentation on these appeals to the Freedom of Association Committee of the ILO.

In addition the State, true to its neo-liberal policies, has not been intervening in labour relations and renounced its role as protector and promoter of the weakest sectors of industry with the aim of creating a free labour market; in other words, of turning the worker into an object of supply and demand, and forcing workers with employment problems to seek redress in the courts.

In line with this, and on the dubious grounds that job security discourages investment, the Government has passed legislation, the so-called "Act on the promotion of employment" (No. 728). This law in fact regulates the employment contract, promoting casual employment and doing away with security for workers hired since the promulgation of the law. Despite the time which has passed, we have not noted any increase in employment. I would also like to draw attention to another act, the so-called "Act on collective labour relations" (No. 25593), which eliminates a number of provisions which promoted labour relations in the past and has in fact put in their place provisions which attack deny or abolish constitutional employment rights, guarantees which are universally recognized in, among other instruments, ILO Conventions.

This legislation regulates union activity, promotes the fragmentation of union organizations at all levels, prohibits trade union leaders from participating in politics, authorizes dissolution by any person with a direct interest and legal power, requires the registration and control of activities, books and documents by any authority in flagrant contradiction with Convention No. 87. At the same time, it regulates collective bargaining by limiting the validity of agreements to only one year, eliminating the force of law of the texts for the signatories, and replacing it by a weak binding provision, requires the mandatory revision of previous collective agreements, eliminates sui generis contracts and the insertion of article 1355 of the Civil Code in contracts. The Ministry of Labour intervenes only at the conciliation stage, and arbitration is made compulsory in the cases of enterprises whose services are essential in the opinion of the Government.

The right to strike, which is universally recognized and constitutionally established in our country, has in fact been nullified and, through a very complicated legal procedure, its effective application has in fact been thwarted. Even more serious, it is a ground for automatic dismissal. Stoppages which in the opinion of the authorities create serious risks to persons or equipment can be legally stopped or interrupted by the authorities.

"Essential services" are determined by the law and the number of workers prevented from participating in a strike is determined by the law and the authorities.

Collective rights, such as the right to unionization, collective bargaining and the right to strike are only vaguely mentioned in passing in the new Constitution and this means that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 will be legal instruments which will have to be enforced by actual use.

We have taken a step backwards of more than 50 years in labour legislation. The neo-liberal zeal is jeopardizing social peace and consensus. In a society ravaged by violence, economic crisis and instability, we can expect further undemocratic measures against the workers.

Despite this distressing situation in our country, the workers believe that their problems will be overcome and that the Government will be able to provide sources of work and decent wages. We hope that the world will understand us. I would like to take this opportunity to appeal to governments and workers worldwide so that the external debt of the underdeveloped countries such as Peru can be cancelled in the interest of peace, the harmonious development of humanity as a whole and the dignity of human beings in our country who are striving for justice.

The ILO must take account of this reality and assume its role over and above the ritual of speeches and declarations of good intent.

Mr. NAIK (Workers' delegate, India) - On behalf of the Workers' delegation from India, and on my own behalf, I convey to the President hearty congratulations on his unanimous election to guide the conduct of this 80th Session of the Conference of this august body, the only United Nations agency which is tripartite in character. I also extend our felicitations to the three distinguished delegates who have been elected as Vice-Presidents.

This year the Director-General has drawn our attention, through his Report, to an issue of vital concern to any civilized society. Throughout the ages, man has sought social security and freedom from want and distress. From its modest beginning during the initial decades of the present century, social security has since become a fact of life for millions of people the world over. Social security measures have introduced an element of stability and protection in the midst of the stresses and strains of modern life. It is a major aspect of public policy today and its prevalence is an indicator of the progress made by our country towards the ideal of a welfare State.

The concept of social security stems from the ideals of human dignity and social justice. Social security is an incentive for development, substituting as it does hopes for fear, and in the process, improving the efficiency of the working force. Its costs are offset by gains in productive efficiency on the one hand, and on the other, increased savings through the contributions it makes to a country's development.

Since its inception in 1919, the International Labour Organization has played a very significant role in setting international standards of social insurance and in the promotion of social security. Through its Conventions and Recommendations, the ILO has been exerting its influence to extend the range and the classes of people protected, the contingencies covered and to improve the efficacy of the benefits assured.

In India there are numerous statutory measures providing for social security for workers, such as the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1923, the Employees State Insurance Act of 1948, the Maternity Benefit Act of 1961, the Employees Provident Fund and Miscellaneous Provisions Act of 1952 and the Payment of Gratuity Act of 1972. In addition, there is legislation like the Coal Mines Provident Fund and Bonus Schemes Act, the Coal Mines Labour Welfare Fund Act, the Mica Mines Labour Welfare Fund Act, the Iron Ore Labour Welfare Cess Act, the Assam Tea Plantation Employees Welfare Fund Act, the Dockworkers (Regulation of Employment) Act and the Plantation Labour Act. The central and State government employees have the benefit of a pension scheme to which they do not contribute. For the welfare of aged persons, most of the State governments and union territory administrations have introduced old-age pension schemes. For workers of poor families not covered under any insurance scheme or any law, the union government has introduced the Personal Accident Insurance Social Security Scheme, which is applicable to all persons between 18 and 55 years of age who are wage-earners with a poor family and who have become victims of fatal accidents like drowning and snake bites.

The array of social security measures in operation in the country in the interest of the working class, which I am privileged to represent at this session, looks very impressive indeed. But it has to be conceded that these are a few drops in the ocean. It needs to be admitted that since independence, due attention has not been given to social security as such. Only about 3 to 4 per cent of the GDP is being spent on social security. Legislation and other social security measures benefit hardly 10 per cent of the country's workforce of 315 million. Millions of workers in rural areas and in the informal sector do not have any social security.

In a bid to provide a pension to a worker's family in the event of his death, the Employees Family Pension Scheme was brought in under the Employees Provident Fund Scheme. The scheme, with over 13.67 million subscribers, is financed by diverting 1.16 per cent of both workers' and employers' contributions to the Provident Fund. The accumulation of enormous amounts of money in the family pension scheme is ample proof that the family pension is not being received by the widows of deceased workers and the ineffective operation of the scheme due to the callous bungling of the bureaucracy, devoid of a humanitarian approach.

There is also in operation an Employees' Deposit-Linked Insurance Scheme to which workers are not required to contribute. There has been for a long time a suggestion for evolving an integrated social security scheme. The trade union's demand for pensions, as a third form of retirement benefit for workers led to the proposal for the conversion of a part of the Provident Fund into a retirement pension.

The Central Board of Trustees of the Employees Provident Fund Organization, which is tripartite in nature, had recommended a pension scheme to the Government of India, which has decided to introduce the scheme with certain modifications. The workers are not called upon to make any additional contribution to the pension scheme. The present Employees Family Pension Scheme is to become the core of the new pension fund, to which 8.33 per cent of the contribution from the employers' share of the Provident Fund will be added. The pension scheme provides for superannuation pension, retirement pension, permanent total disability pension, a widow or widower's pension, children's pension and an orphan pension. A Bill to amend the Employees Provident Fund and Miscellaneous Provisions Acts has already been proposed in Parliament. It has yet to be taken up for discussion.

Although the workers by and large feel that they will be paying out more than they will receive, the majority of trade unions are of the view that the new pension scheme should just be improved and not totally rejected. Though the workers do not get anything beyond their present entitlement, in the absence of any State-financed social security the new scheme needs to be implemented. The introduction of the pension scheme will mean the acceptance of workers' entitlement to a pension. Almost all trade union centres, including the INTUC, India's main trade union centre, to which I belong, have demanded prior consultations before the finalization of the scheme and the Government has agreed.

It is over two years since India embarked upon economic reforms with a new liberalized industrial policy. The adoption of advanced technologies will inevitably have a knock-on effect on labour and the proposal to allow the closure of uneconomical industrial units, especially in the public sector, will lead to a considerable fall in employment in organized industries. The Government promises to protect the displaced workers by providing a social safety net through the National Renewal Fund. The Fund is to retrain, redeploy and also pay compensation to persons affected. A part of it will be allocated to the generation of employment. The extent of protection that the National Renewal Fund will actually provide to the workers made redundant is debatable.

The Social Security Association of India, a voluntary organization of which I am a life-member, has submitted to the Government a proposal for an unemployment insurance scheme which will benefit workers affected by the implementation of the new industrial policy, and which is reported to be under serious consideration by the Government.

It needs to be recognized that any social security measures should not be confined to only one section of society – the workers in the formal sector – but should cover all able-bodied men and women without gainful employment, and also the aged who are in no condition to work. But in a country like India, with a very large population of poor and unemployed people, limited resources will be the ready excuse for the inability to introduce universal social security. The State should therefore think in terms of levying a statutory social security tax on all those with earnings beyond a specified level that allow them to lead an ostentatious life. The corporate bodies who have been bestowed with generous concessions under the over-liberalized new economic and industrial policies should be brought under the purview of this social security tax.

There is an imperative need to work out an ideal arrangement towards a comprehensive social security plan by pooling all available resources. In this task, the ILO can allow the use of its expertise and guidance.

Mr. SHAMENDA (Workers' delegate, Zambia) – I should first like to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to preside over the 80th Session of the ILO Conference. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, on his re-election – a sign of confidence that the member States of the ILO have in him.

Since its inception this Organization has established itself as the international custodian of social justice, and as the advocate for improvement in living conditions and standards of all people. It is saddening therefore to note that every year we hear reports of exploitation, complaints of violations of trade union and human rights; every year we have Governments appearing before the Committee of the Application of Standards; to the embarrassment of this honourable Organization, even countries with an old tradition of democracy have not been spared.

Year in, year out, we have a country which is also a member of the ILO with a trade union leader in jail, and in most cases these members also participate in the deliberations of this august Conference. A case in point was Malawi last year who had left Chakufwa Chihana in jail, the secretary-general of my organization, SATUCC, who was just released last week, and because of the trouble of the workers in Malawi, and the results of the referendum, they bear testimony of what democratic principles workers stand for.

As we are meeting today, brother Mugalla, who has just recently been re-elected as a member of the Governing Body, had to leave the Conference to go and face charges of inciting workers to go on strike. Meanwhile, the ILO recognizes the right to strike. There are endless examples that I can give.

The fundamental principle on which the ILO was founded was to improve the living conditions and the standard of life for mankind. But as we meet every year thousands of workers in our countries keep losing their jobs; and as regards those who are still in employment, we are not sure how many we shall find still in their jobs.

Life is not only unbearable for the unemployed, but even for those still in employment. In my country, with the implementation of the structural adjustment programme (SAP), as said by my Minister yesterday, we have seen the creation of the "new poor".

In a recent field research study conducted between January and December 1992 by the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development, entitled Crisis adjustment and social change among the Zambian urban poor under SAP, a glaring picture of the impact of the SAP on the vulnerable groups has emerged. The study sought to determine how the SAP has impacted the people's livelihood and to assess the response they took to hedge against the negative consequences of the SAP. The study revealed that the Zambian Government was implementing SAP with rapidity (this, we believe, is because of the conditionalities imposed by the IMF and the World Bank) and the comprehensiveness which confounded critics and, at times, baffled the ordinary person with regard to the harshness of measures under the SAP.

The study further revealed that while the SAP was accepted in general, few members of the public understood its full negative consequences. The socio-economic cost has undoubtedly been far-reaching as society becomes increasingly highly differentiated into the haves and have-nots. In the process, the SAP has left many institutions responsible for social welfare incapacitated due to the escalation of costs of running a social welfare delivery system and rapidly expanding clientele.

The study contended that the SAP has not only distorted the cost of the social welfare system but has created a myriad of social welfare needs requiring urgent new approaches to the social welfare programme. These approaches, the study found out, are absent. Where they exist, they fall short of the frontiers they are expected to harness.

The impact of the SAP on Zambian society has been overriding with regard to its comprehensiveness and intensity. It is obvious that the rapidity with which it has been implemented has led to socio-economic shock effects on the poor majority. Witness the fact that price spirals are registered in every aspect of social and economic life: transport, medical care, education, to mention a few.

Many of our members (lower wage earners) are being declared redundant because of the process of liberalization and privatization. A worker who has been declared redundant has to confront the problem of assessing his financial limitations in the face of pressing socio-economic needs. More often than not he is too poor to even have a house of his own. Major decisions have to be taken as to how to invest the retirement package in the face of mounting inflation. Added to this burden are the multiple and usual domestic pressures from members of the household – for instance, child education and health needs, which tend to impinge on economic decisions.

The United Nations research study noted as equally disturbing and disheartening the sharp decline in real household income, as inflation takes its toll, and the widening gap between household income generation capacities and the cost of household domestic needs, that is food, shelter and especially sanitation.

This aspect is said to be true of households in both the informal and formal sectors.

Income generation normally falls below what is calculated as the poverty datum line (PDL). Thus the SAP has increased the number of "new poor", to borrow from the World Bank, which refers to victims of SAPs who have fallen below the PDL as a result of the IMF and World Bank reform measures; it has distorted the plight of the vulnerable groups while pushing the conditions of the "chronic poor", that is to say those whose poverty predates the SAP and is deep-seated, but who are rendered poorer in most cases by the SAP, beyond acceptable levels. The SAP has therefore distorted the dimensions of relative and absolute poverty in no uncertain way.

The study concluded that child and adult morbidity associated with malnutrition are bound to double within the next five years unless affirmative action is taken to contain the situation. Poor diet is likely to push up the incidence of the most common diseases, some of which are associated with low standards of sanitation and hygiene. In a country faced with the AIDS crisis, this indeed is unacceptable and needs to be redressed. As it was noted, sanitation and hygiene-related diseases such as cholera and dysentery have already left fatal footprints on our social landscape that can only be effectively and permanently obliterated by improving sanitation and hygiene. To this end, more social and health workers will have to be drawn into battlefields and this form of intervention is only possible when commitment and resources are mobilized and effected.

We believe that the pace of the structural adjustment programme must be harmonized with the implementation of social protection measures and that the two should be fully integrated.

The positive role we played as a trade union organization in realizing political or formal democracy obliges us to participate in the formulation and implementation of political and economic reform measures and thus overcoming the underdevelopment of the Zambian economy. Otherwise, our newly found democracy risks turning out to be a false start. The euphoria which followed immediately after the movement for multi-party democracy came to power has died down. The honeymoon is over. People now are looking for affirmative action on the part of the Government to lessen their sufferings and the ILO can play a vital role by assisting our Government, our employers' organizations and our trade union movement.

Original French: Mr. IBOUROI ALI TABIBOU (Workers' delegate, Comoros) – Like the preceding speakers, I should like to congratulate the President warmly on his election to this high office. I am convinced that together with his team he will bring our work at the present session of the International Labour Conference to safe harbour.

On behalf of the Comorian trade unions, I would like to say that it is a great honour for us to participate in this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Recently created, our trade union organizations are firmly engaged in strenuous combat for recognition and action to achieve national reconstruction with a view to providing the country with new institutions which will set up comprehensive legislation to ensure meaningful social dialogue.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent Report as well as for having chosen those themes which are being debated at this session. They are important because they reflect the concerns of the ILO and its commitment to improve the conditions of life of populations and, in particular, the most disfavoured. Greater social justice, less poverty – these are difficult tasks at a time when populations are suffering from serious disintegration.

My country is in the grip of economic crisis and is undertaking a programme of structural adjustment the effects of which can now be measured. But this programme cannot or does not seem to be instrumental in correcting social inequalities and fighting against poverty. Furthermore, workers have been neglected. Indeed, with the benediction of the Bretton Woods institutions, our Government intends to lay off several thousand civil servants who will be left without any social coverage and who will add to other strata of society in swelling the large mass of the poor, who are increasingly marginalized and excluded from the socio-economic growth about which so much has been said. Structural adjustment has not produced what it should have, since it affects a little less than 10 per cent of the labour force. In a country where population growth is disquieting, we run the risk of seeing the threat of misery and poverty at a time when endemic unemployment is increasing and affects mostly the young.

Faced with the gravity of the economic situation, the Government has not as yet defined a national employment policy and maintains that it is actively supporting a private sector which is embryonic in growth.

At the time when we are trying to reduce inequalities to give greater opportunities to the difference strata of the population, the Government is getting out of vital sectors such as education and health. This, in a country where human resources are its greatest wealth, thus deprives those who do not have the means to go to school or to seek medical care.

For several years, workers have been hoping for the establishment of a policy for the retraining of those affected by adjustment programmes, but nothing has occurred to palliate their situation. On the contrary, despair and anxiety affect all the employees in our country, as they observe a continuing deterioration in the employment situation and are deprived of any social protection. Certain provision made by the Government do away with consultation, making it mandatory for workers to strike in order to get what is their right. Employment is not guaranteed even if salaries are cut back by as much as 30 per cent.

The price paid by the workers is heavy, whereas structural adjustment has not yet really focused on the reorganization of public finances nor the development of independent employment. Neither is it supporting small and medium-sized enterprises. It is merely synonymous with lay-offs leaving workers unprotected and with no assistance in retraining. Any social dimension to a programme for structural adjustment is a snare and a delusion.

The role of the ILO should be more dynamic in ensuring respect for laws and recommendations and in supporting the action of trade unions in the face of the violation of the most basic human rights. Certain anti-democratic practices over-penalize the workers. There is a climate of intimidation in Comoros which prevents the exercise of freedom of association. Strikes are very seldom used because there is a marked campaign of disinformation. Trade unions are afraid to strike because strike is synonymous with criminal action.

This comes from the fact that labour legislation is not known to the public at large, neither are the laws and conventions which protect workers. In the absence of any consultative body, we have to pay the consequences.

The Director-General's Report stresses the importance of social protection and the need to improve the corresponding machinery. I would like to touch on two phenomena which are the very negation of the ILO's activities.

First, the Government of my country has ratified certain Conventions merely to file them away in a drawer. There is no system of social protection, apart from the retirement fund.

The list of unratified Conventions points to a denial of ILO principles as regards fundamental rights and tripartism. Let us hope that the Government will deign to give some assessment regarding measures taken to apply Conventions, and ensure compliance with the same.

If there have been improvements in legislation, we must nevertheless indicate that the Government's attitude as concerns the respect for the law and for its commitments is still a source of concern. The fate of the framework agreement signed by the Government and the trade unions is revealing. The Government knew before it signed that it was not going to respect the agreement, but it had to neutralize a social movement that was proving to be bothersome. The Government must understand that the recourse to strike and to protest measures is not a crime, but a basic human right.

Our trade union organizations have always denounced the discrepancy between legislation and day-to-day practice. It is only with great difficulties that we carry out our trade union work. This is due partly to our ignorance of trade unionism, but the more serious problems are insufficient time available to trade union leaders and the serious lack of logistical means.

We cannot but request the intensification of standard-setting activities to provide the necessary assistance to workers' organizations in my country, and to set up supervisory machinery to written compliance with the law, and the promotion of social justice.

In conclusion, the assistance of the ILO in the field of trade union education, given of our lack of experience, would be highly appreciated.

Mr. ANIGBO (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Nigeria) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Nigeria and myself it is a great honour to associate myself with the other speakers in offering warm congratulations to the President and to the other Officers of this session of the Conference. I am confident that under their wise and able leadership the Conference's deliberations will be most successful. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO and I wish him a successful tenure of office.

The reports of both the Governing Body and the Director-General are highly commendable and I hope that our deliberations will be useful in tackling most of the problems, some of which are global in nature.

The topic of the Director-General's Report – Social insurance and social protection – has been well chosen. This is a major topical issue and is closely related to individuals' and families' social and economic welfare. Social security should be seen as a comprehensive and integrated system of services by which the State will provide a decent standard of living for the population.

These services include education, medical care and social insurance, to mention but a few.

In Nigeria, most of what workers had achieved in this regard through negotiated agreements has since been eroded because of the implementation of the International Monetary Fund/World Bank structural adjustment programmes for over five years now. The workers of Nigeria have never had it so bad. The unemployment rate has continued to increase and some of those still working, such as the railway workers and those in the teaching profession, have been subjected to irregular payment of salaries.

The workers are aware of the assistance and other help the ILO has provided in amending and adopting our National Provident Fund Act of 1961. We remain very grateful to the ILO. It has been claimed by our Government that the Fund has been transformed into a limited social security scheme. Unfortunately so far the worker contributors have yet to feel the impact of the said transformation.

Another crucial issue in Nigeria is the current vigorous campaign for the so-called "correct pricing" of petroleum products within the country. The federal Government is conducting this campaign through the Nigeria National Petroleum Company.

The workers are satisfied that the Government's intention is based on severe pressure from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

We are equally aware that any increase in this regard without an appropriate and corresponding increase in workers' emoluments and improvements in other social services will trigger serious negative economic and social consequences for the working class. My organization, the Nigerian Labour Congress, has resolved to remain opposed to any price increase for the petroleum products without adequate safeguards.

Finally, my delegation joins others, especially those of the developing countries or nations, in calling for the discontinuation of the International Monetary Fund/World Bank structural adjustment programmes which have proved not only a woeful failure but also have served as an instrument of economic recolonization of some countries in the so-called Third World.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to Mr. Ahmad Mohd Idrus, Government delegate, Malaysia, for a right of reply to the statement made by Mr. Zainal, Workers' delegate, Malaysia.

Mr. AHMAD MOHD IDRUS (Government delegate, Malaysia) – The allegation by the Malaysian Workers' delegate that the Government's preference for enterprise or in-house unions for the electronics workers is due to pressure from the multinational companies is unfounded. The Government desires what is best for its citizens. It has not submitted and it will not submit to any form of pressure from any quarters.

The Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC), while assuming the role to determine a type of union the electronic workers should belong to, has apparently forgotten that the right of workers to form or join "unions of their own choosing" includes the right to form or join in-house unions. In fact, six in-house unions have so far been formed and registered out of the free will of the electronic workers concerned.

In-house unions are free and independent and they enjoy the same rights and protection accorded to national unions, including the right to collective bargaining and to strike, and the right to affiliate with any trade union coordinating body like the MTUC or international trade secretariats.

Evidence and empirical research abound in other countries where enterprise unions have been proven to be very successful and effective in protecting the welfare and interests of workers. There is no reason why it should not be so in Malaysia.

I would have also like to correct the misconception conceived by the Workers' delegate that the conferences in Manila and Teheran had proposed that there should be a separate set of labour standards for developing countries. What in fact had been proposed was for the ILO to review and update existing labour standards to enable flexible implementation of such standards in labour administration and their meaningful and pragmatic application.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.50 p.m.)

Credentials

Third Report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

2. The objecting organization indicated that the nomination of the Workers' delegation violated the provisions of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, and that the nomination of persons who were not recognized representatives of the workers in their country was against the spirit and principle of tripartism which was the fundamental basis of all ILO activities. It requested the rejection of the credentials of the said delegation. The ICFTU based its objection on the following facts: In its view, the genuine Sudan Workers' Trade Union Federation (SWTUF) was obliged by circumstances prevailing in Sudan to operate in exile. It pointed out that the Trade Union Act adopted in 1992 contained far-reaching restrictions on the right to organize, including the imposition of a single trade union system. The trade union elections in August were run by the Government and only its supporters participated, opponents having been detained or harassed. A congress of all trade unions was called by the Government in February 1993 for the purpose of being affiliated to a pro-government umbrella organization – the new SWTUF – but the elections were conducted in an atmosphere of fear and dishonesty which enabled the Government to impose their supporters upon the new SWTUF in disregard of all trade union rights. In this regard, the objecting organization referred to the recent reports of competent ILO bodies in matters of freedom of association.

3. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Ali Ahmed Sahloul, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Sudan, informed the Committee that since the 79th Session of the Conference, there had been developments in the trade union organizations in his country. On the basis of the 1992 Trade Union Act, elections had taken place in February 1993, a process which had covered all the organizational levels and had been supervised by neutral committees approved by the trade unions. The General Congress of the SWTUF was convened in February 1993 and was attended by the "Organization of African Trade Union Organization" (sic), the International Arab Trade Unions Federation and the Arab Labour Organization. It elected trade union delegates representing 26 Central Trade Unions and nine State Trade Unions. The Congress had also elected the Central Committee of the Federation as well as the leading officials of its Executive Bureau, whose names appear in the List of delegations. The SWTUF represented workers in national collective bargaining and in the national tripartite higher wages council as well as in the Arab Labour Organization, the African Labour Commission, the "OUATO" and the International Arab Trade Union Federation. The persons in the Workers' delegation were duly elected within a free democratic process and entitled to represent the SWTUF in the ILO as they had done in past years.

4. The Committee took note of the developments reported by the Government which had taken place since the 79th Session of the Conference concerning the trade union elections in August 1992 and February 1993. It notes, however, that these elections according to the Government were based on the 1992 Trade Union Act, with regard to which observations had been made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its 281st and 284th Reports (Case No. 1508). Given the trade union situation as reflected in these reports the Committee continued to doubt that the Workers' delegation of Sudan was truly representative of the workers of that country. However as the questions of freedom of association were within the competence of the Committee on Freedom of Association, and the case was presently under consideration by it, the Committee decided not to propose invalidation.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Togo

5. The Committee had before it an objection from the "Collectif des Syndicats indépendants" (CSI) to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Togo.

6. According to the objection, the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Togo should be rejected since they had been transmitted by a Government established contrary to the Constitution in force and which had been declared illegal by the "Haut Conseil de la République" (HCR), supreme organ of the transition guarantor of the norms established by the "Conférence Nationale Souveraine" (CNS).

7. The CSI, which grouped together three out of the four recognized central organizations, was not represented in the Workers' delegation. This was composed of the Secretary General of the "Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs du Togo" (CNTT), an organization which had not supported the general unlimited strike in which all forces of the country had participated, and the Secretary General of the "Union Générale des Syndicats Libres" (UGSL), an organization created during the strike in order to break it in favour of political forces hostile to the democratization of the country.

8. In a written communication to the Committee, made at its request, Mr. J. Gaba-Dovi, Minister of Employment, Labour and the Public Service and head of the delegation of Togo to the Conference, indicated that since the movement towards democracy was initiated in Togo, four central organizations existed in the country of equal importance: the "Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs du Togo" (CNTT), the "Confédération Syndicale des Travailleurs du Togo" (CSTT), the "Union Nationale des Syndicats Indépendants du Togo" (UNSIT) and the "Groupe des Syndicats Autonomes" (GSA), the last three being grouped in the CSI. A fifth central organization had been established in 1992, the UGSL, which was of the same importance as the other four. All the organizations mentioned, which satisfied the conditions of representativity as defined in the Labour Code, had been invited by the Minister of Labour to a meeting to determine the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference. The CSI did not respond to the invitation and did not justify its absence. This being the case, it was decided to assign the position of the Workers' delegate to the CNTT and adviser to the UGSL. The Government had therefore acted in accordance with Article 3 of the ILO Constitution.

9. As regards the statement in the objection concerning the political situation in the country and the alleged illegality of the authority which had issued the credentials, the Committee pointed out that it could not take a position on such questions as they were essentially related to a situation of internal political unrest.

10. With respect to the representativity of the Workers' organizations, the Committee noted, from the information provided by the Government, that the CSI appeared to be the most representative of the Workers' organizations in the country and a member of it should therefore have been appointed in the Workers' delegation in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. At the same time, the Committee took note that the Government had fulfilled its obligation of carrying out consultations as the invitation to the CSI to take part in the consultations implied that the Government had taken the latter's representativity into account. In the circumstances, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of a Workers' adviser of Romania

11. The Committee had before it an objection to one of the advisers in the Workers' delegation of Romania which had been lodged by the Workers' delegate at the present Conference on behalf of six Romanian Workers' organizations. They requested the invalidation of the credentials of the adviser, Mr. Miron Cosma from the Confederation of Mining Trade Unions of Romania (CSMR), on the ground that article 3, paragraphs 1 and 5, of the ILO Constitution had not been complied with and that they had not been consulted on the adviser's appointment.

12. In a written statement made to the Committee at its request, Mr. Dan Mircea Popescu, Minister of Labour and Social Protection of Romania, gave a list of seven Workers' organizations which were considered the most representative in terms of membership. The list included five of the six objecting organizations as well as (in the penultimate position) the organization of the adviser objected to. The five largest of those organizations (including four of the objectors) had been invited by the Government to two consultations, at which the adviser's organization was also represented. The participants in those consultations were invited to nominate the Workers' delegate and advisers, taking into account representativity and the specific subjects on the Conference's agenda and bearing in mind that the Government could only cover the expenses of the Workers' delegate and one adviser. The participating organizations were also invited to propose additional Workers' advisers provided that they covered the latter's travelling and subsistence expenses. These were the circumstances in which the subject of the objection had been included among the seven additional advisers accredited. The representative of the organization objected to had participated in the consultations without opposition and the possibility that the organization might be included in the Workers' delegation if it covered the expenses had not been the subject of any challenge.

13. While the selection of six out of the eight advisers by reference to their organization's ability to bear their expenses was not at issue in this case, the Committee wished to point out that this should not be a criterion for selection to the detriment of the principle of representativity. On the objection itself, the Committee noted – in the absence of any information provided by the objectors concerning the consultation procedures – that the objectors had been given some opportunity to make their views known concerning the possible participation of the organization concerned and that – in terms of membership, which was the only criterion for which information had been received – it appeared reasonable to have included the adviser's organization among those invited to provide additional advisers. The Committee therefore decided not to uphold the objection. In so doing, it recalled that governments should, as far as possible, seek the agreement of the most representative organizations concerned on the nomination of all the non-governmental delegates and advisers.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua

14. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua, Mr. Roberto Moreno, from the "Central de Acción y Unidad Sindical" (CAUS) submitted by the "Central Sandinista de Trabajadores" (CST).

15. The objecting organization maintained that the nomination of the Workers' delegate contravened the provisions of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. The consultation procedure was deficient and three organizations – the "Asociación Nacional de Educadores (ANDEN)", the "Unión Nacional de Empleadores" (UNE) and the "Federación Nacional de Trabajadores de la Salud" (FETSALUD) – which had a recognized representativity at the national and international level were omitted from the consultations. The CST and the "Asociación de Trabajadores del Campo" (ATC) attended the meeting with the intention of reaching agreement among the central organizations on a system of rotation which would preserve the representativity as recognized by the ILO of the CST. The Government, however, assigned the position of titular delegate to the CAUS and did not even nominate an adviser from the CST. In this respect, the objecting organization recalled that the Credentials Committee had reiterated that in the absence of agreement among the organizations, the decision should be taken in agreement with the most representative of them.

16. According to the statistics of the Ministry of Labour, the CST had 12,000 affiliates, eight times more than the CAUS and had participated in 27 collective agreements while the CAUS had only participated in three. In addition, the CST and the ATC had received the mandate of the ANDEN, the UNE and FETSALUD to represent them which together with the CST and the ATC represented 65% of organized labour in Nicaragua.

17. The objecting organization also referred to the last reports of the Committee which had confirmed the greater representativity of the CST and the ATC and concluded by stating that "the rotation of minority trade unions" which the Government had then applied was evidence of a political desire to exclude the CST and the ATC from occupying the position of the Workers' delegate. In the last four years, neither of these two organizations had figured as titular delegate.

18. In a written communication to the Committee, made at its request, Mr. F. Rosales Argüello, Minister of Labour and head of the delegation of Nicaragua to the Conference, referred to the organizations existing before the 1979 revolution, one of which was the CAUS. These organizations had acquired their representative character in the fight against the dictatorships under Somoza and the Sandinist regime. During the Sandinist regime, with the political objective of instituting a single confederation of workers, all individual and collective rights, including those of freedom of association and collective bargaining had been repressed and none of these organizations had been nominated as part of any delegation to the ILO. The present Government had recognized all trade union rights and all workers' organizations including the CST and the ATC fully exercised them.

19. All the organizations were invited to a consultation meeting to determine the composition of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua. The meeting conformed to the terms of the ILO Constitution and in the absence of agreement, the organizations present had left it to the Minister of Labour to make the nomination. The decision had in fact been taken on the proposal of the representative of the CST at the said meeting, the same person who had signed the objection in the name of that organization.

20. There was not at present any definition of representativity. The criteria used went from the fight against the Somocista and Sandinista dictatorships to trade union audience, trade union activity, collective bargaining, etc. On the other hand, the present Government had never requested the organizations to produce books or membership records considering that this would be contrary to freedom of association.

21. The Committee noted that consultations had been undertaken and that the objecting organization had agreed that the Minister would make the nomination although it was later not in agreement with the nomination made.

22. The Committee considered it essential that the Government should take all reasonable steps to evaluate the representativity of the different organizations in terms of affiliation, rather than solely relying on other criteria, doubtless important but unquantifiable, like trade union audience, trade union activity, participation in the fight against dictatorships, etc. In the absence of such information, the Committee could only take into account the figures provided by the objecting organization which gave rise to doubt that the Government had properly exercised its discretion concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation.

23. In the light of the above considerations and given that, as last year, consultations had taken place, the Committee decided not to propose invalidation. The Committee, however, considered that the Government should strive to re-examine its consultation procedures, which should be preceded by procedures which would permit the objective evaluation of the importance of the organizations. It was only in this way that such consultations could fulfil their essential objective so that the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua could be made in agreement with all the most representative Workers' organizations in Nicaragua.

24. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

NINTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We have before us the Ninth Report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 5H.

If there are no objections, may I take it that this report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now resume our discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

At 11 a.m. we shall have a record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1994-95, and then we shall revert to the general discussion.

Mr. HORNLUND (Minister of Labour, Sweden) – First of all, I congratulate the President on his election to chair this important session of the Conference.

Despite the détente between the former great power blocs, the horrors of war have now come to Europe as well, with new States being torn apart by violence and destruction.

We cannot at this Conference influence what happens in a situation where the force of arms has supplanted the force of arguments, but we can, and should, express the sympathy and solidarity we feel towards people who are suffering as a result of aggression and armed conflicts.

Here, delegates from all over the world are meeting to join in finding common solutions and international norms for tackling and coping with problems and challenges. Discussion and compromise are our instruments, not aggression.

Two points I would like to dwell on especially are the struggle against poverty and the promotion of equality between men and women. To the ILO, these questions are of central importance and, international interdependence being what it is, they are of concern to all of us.

The United Nations Human Development Report 1993 shows, among other things, that nearly one out of every three women is illiterate. This applies to hardly any woman in the industrialized world, but to fully two-thirds of women in the least developed countries, where average life expectancy at birth there is 25 years less than for women in the industrialized countries. In the world as a whole, only one Member of Parliament in ten is a woman, and in the 157 countries surveyed, only one woman in three is included in the labour force.

But half the world stock of intelligence is female, and half the world's human resources are embodied by women. Thus far, there is no difference between rich and poor, people or countries. Constraints on women entail tremendous losses of competence and an immense wastage of resources.

It will take female and male thinking, experience and effort to fashion a new and better world. In the meeting of men and women on equal terms, a new dynamism and creativity can be developed. Hence the urgent necessity of equality between the sexes.

Many affluent countries today have serious problems of government finance. In the cutbacks which are being made, it is important to safeguard the welfare functions which are particularly vital to women, otherwise a limitation of welfare can make women the big losers, in which case the economic problems will not be solved but aggravated.

In poor countries the need for greater opportunity is no less imperative. For many women life is an uninterrupted story of discrimination, poverty, disease and servitude, all the way from the cradle to the grave. Through a combination of legislation and culture, women in some quarters are denied basic human rights.

Areas of environmental concern are growing larger and more numerous. Over and over again, the fateful connection between poverty and destruction of the environment is being confirmed, with poverty aggravating environmental problems and vice versa.

We know that the ecological system cannot cope with the population growth that is expected. Unless the connection between growth and environmental destruction is broken, the growth of population and output will lead, as the World Bank says, to intolerable conditions. This will mean a growing number of regional and local environmental crises, of accelerating scale and intensity. It will mean faster soil erosion, acute water shortages, rapidly growing health problems due to pollution, regional climatic crises and uncontrolled population movements.

For more than 1 billion people these things are not only a potential threat, they are a present reality. Positive development demands both economic and social reforms, aimed at supporting sustainable economic growth and promoting productive employment. Growth with a human face is an important aim, but growth with a democratic face is equally important.

The majority of developing countries and young States are passing through several revolutions at once. They are trying to change both the political and the economic system, and at the same time to adjust to a global economy. And these things are happening in countries which are still struggling to build themselves into nations and very often are having to cope with the sequel to prolonged political conflicts or war and ecological depletion.

Democratic development and a workable, legitimate apparatus of State are preconditions, both for the market and for the social and physical environment. Growth is necessary, but if it is to become sustainable and poverty to be reduced, an active distributive policy is also needed, with the causes of poverty and the needs of the poor in the forefront of attention.

It is the sad fact of our times that poverty generates conflicts and that conflicts in turn aggravate poverty. The problems are complex. They demand, as the expression goes, a broad approach, and so I welcome the present ILO discussion in that direction.

The interaction between different fields of activity must be developed and efforts must be concentrated on the practical fields that really count. Then, and only then, can the ILO convincingly demonstrate the fundamental role of work and enterprise in the development process and the ILO's ability to contribute towards that process.

This is why I look forward with great interest to the discussion of the Organization's work, scheduled for next year's session of the Conference. Our standard-setting work is in need of renewal. A low level of ratification and implementation is often defended on the grounds that the instruments, after all, are a target for the member countries. But that is a downgrading of the Conventions.

There is a risk that increasingly detailed provisions will come into conflict with natural diversity and rapid developments. This is a strong argument in favour of concentrating the work of the ILO on fields where the problems make most difference to people's working conditions and where the need for common solutions is greatest.

In a highly changeable world with great differences between its various parts, there are strong reasons for the ILO to focus on basic human rights in working life, and for abandoning the aim of supplying detailed standards in narrow fields which then receive little support. Instead, the natural course is for the ILO to assist the developing countries unbureaucratically in building up structures appropriate to their conditions and needs.

As the Director-General has pointed out, we must avoid the mechanical transposition of ready-made solutions from one country to another. In many developing countries there is much to be said for small-scale, local and informal solutions. The ILO has access to a comprehensive competence on the subject of working conditions, a competence which should be channelled into a development process of this kind. Real influence comes from competence and capacity, and it is only when the ILO shows, in concrete terms, that tripartite cooperation yields better results that the Organization can assert its authority.

Finally, we have to remember that for young States liberty can be made useless by poverty and chaos, lack of protection and capital. They will then find themselves in the same situation as under the old oppression but without the dream of liberty which oppression kept alive for them.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I wish to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their elections and the Director-General for his recent re-election and his Report to this Conference.

After last year, I expected the Director-General to come up with some controversial material to enliven our debate. But it seems that others have now taken that function upon themselves, so the Director-General has been able to produce a solid report which sets out many basic ILO objectives in a useful manner.

The Report clearly responds to all those who would in a cavalier and populist way set out to revise the ILO's objectives, structures and working methods in one big sweep. The Director-General reminds us that our aims go back to the Constitution, the Atlantic Charter and the Declaration of Philadelphia. He appropriately recalls that the standards adopted in the immediate post-war period were not a reflection of what had taken place until then, but of what should take place so that people could look forward to a better future. This is important for today's debate as well.

The day we give up searching for a better future and simply adapt ILO standards and goals to what has, or has not, been achieved so far is the day we will get off course. We thus would become reactive, and can then also abandon the hope of having any real say in the United Nations system or elsewhere in the world community.

If the ILO approaches the preparations for the 1995 World Summit on Social Development with only technical or reactive positions and papers, our input will be lost and our authority will shrink. The strength of the ILO lies in a vision of the future, in the role of all of its constituents in shaping this, and in the competence needed to demonstrate how this would work. If we just contemplate our own navel, afraid to talk about the future because we have troubles today, we shall not get anywhere.

Many governments which traditionally have led the way in social protection and the ways to make social justice and full employment contribute to expansion, efficiency and competitivity seem now to be at least half paralysed, and this is a sad situation.

Earlier in this session of the Conference, the Minister of Labour of my own country devoted his speech to the situation in Finland. Although as a rule I prefer to limit myself to addressing the Director-General's Report, now with some regret I feel it is necessary to reply to this particular Minister's speech. (This reflects a broader problem which is also not unknown in the other Nordic country whose distinguished Minister spoke just before me.)

The Finnish Labour Minister said that a new order of priorities may have to be set under unprecedented conditions. He announced a new definition of the target of full employment, noting that this means that not everyone will be guaranteed a job. But revising the concept of full employment by actually abandoning it is an abandonment of what we have called the Nordic model, and it is an abandonment of the interdependence between economic and employment growth which has been the basis of our Nordic behaviour and our achievements.

What is being prescribed here instead is an approach which, among other things, weakens the basis of financing for social protection and promotes a new order of priorities which in the current circumstances invariably is harder on all and puts new strains on solidarity.

As a Nordic Workers' member of the Governing Body, I have been reasonably proud of what is called the Nordic model and I have often used it as an argument. But at least in Finland, and maybe Sweden too, this model seems to be temporarily closed for repairs.

I sincerely trust that it can be salvaged once governments get down to treating the real problem, which is investing in the skills and capacity of our workers and our enterprises so that we can get moving again.

The cost-cutting exercises that we are being offered and that we are going through resemble an old Finnish tale of people under a too short blanket who tried to lengthen it by cutting off the upper part and sewing it on the lower end. If you do that, either your feet or your head stay cold and in the middle it will start to feel increasingly uncomfortable as well. The answer, of course, is to produce more fabric for an adequate blanket, even if we still might have to huddle a bit closer together during the long cold nights.

The fundamental question is one of social consensus and, to paraphrase the conclusions of the Director-General's Report, of organizing solidarity so that normative policies of governments and of the social partners stretch from the grass-root to the national and the international levels. Organizing solidarity calls for a sustained and comprehensive strategy. It has to be based on recognizing, but not revising, the priority issues on the social and economic agenda.

I am somewhat curious as to the reasons why the Director-General hesitates, in this important Report, to raise the question of the role of trade unions. When the Report speaks about reforming institutions and management, it takes a positive view on entrusting more control and authority to the employers and "insured persons". But these persons somehow have to be collectively represented so that the schemes can be managed, so that they can work. The key role of trade unions in organizing solidarity would have merited more mention and recognition.

I wish to conclude my statement by underlining that in all countries tripartite cooperation on social insurance and social protection is necessary, and that it is not a constraint. On the contrary, it is imperative in order to devise and manage social protection schemes. It is worrying that some governments appear to be reaching back to doctrines and approaches where they unilaterally dictate policy and some employers seem to be afraid that there is a kind of sinister totalitarian streak inherent in the practice of tripartism.

Maybe the preparations for next year's anniversary debate, and that debate itself, can reassure them that tripartism was not just a convenient way to combat communism and class warfare, but that it is a sensible way for intelligent women and men to manage their common affairs.

Original Russian*: Mr. ADIYA (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Mongolia and myself I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am sure that, thanks to his experience and knowledge this session of the Conference will end in success. I would also like to extend our sincere congratulations to Mr. Michel Hansenne, on his re-election to the post of Director-General of the ILO.

I would also like to take this opportunity to extend the warm greetings of the workers of Mongolia to all participants in this session.

Before expressing my views on the questions dealt with in the Director-General's Report, I would like to give a brief account of the current social and economic situation in our country. Since the last session of the Conference, my country has embarked upon a process of renewal which concerns all spheres of social life. Thanks to a far-reaching democratization of society, there have been considerable changes in workers' social consciousness. A new system of state management has come into operation.

Although there are considerable difficulties, the transition of the economy to a market system has started. The economy, which was formerly based solely on state ownership has started to diversify. We have privatized more than two-thirds of all state-owned property. In 1992, 43.4 per cent of industrial goods were produced in the private sector. The necessary conditions for free competition have been created and we have started price liberalization, all with a view to stimulating output and supply.

Foreign investment in Mongolia has been stepped up, and recently, the Parliament of the country adopted an Act on encouraging foreign capital investment.

Mongolian workers are extremely grateful to the international, financial and economic organizations and to the many friendly countries which are providing significant assistance in overcoming the economic crisis. In spite of the assistance and the measures that have been taken by the Government, the economic difficulties are continuing and the standard of living of workers is falling. The number of unemployed registered at employment exchanges stands at 54,000. The Government for the time being is not in a position to implement a programme to bring down unemployment. The prices for consumer goods and services by April 1993 had risen almost tenfold as compared with January 1991. In connection with the increase of prices and charges, the Mongolian trade unions called upon the Government to index wages, pensions and benefits. Unfortunately however, we have still not reached a final agreement. Therefore, economic instability will continue in 1993.

In recent years in Mongolia, favourable social and political conditions have been created for a genuine development of the trade union movement and trade unions in Mongolia are being overhauled. The main task for the Mongolian Trade Unions Confederation is to improve the living conditions and social position of workers by creating conditions in which their right to work and freedom of association can be defended.

The repercussions of the totalitarian system are still preventing the formation of a democratic culture and a genuine improvement in the role of trade unions, and a full awareness of what is needed or required to defend workers' rights and their economic interests.

I should like to point out that the Asian and Pacific Regional Organization, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Labour Fund of Japan, the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (Rengo) and the Asian-American Institute for Free Labour and the Workers' Education and Technical Cooperation Branch of the ILO have been giving us considerable assistance in training workers in how to operate under a broad-based democracy and during the transition to a market economy. Now we must deal with the question of training working people as quickly as possible so that they can survive and defend themselves in a market economy. But we lack experience and resources. In this connection, we earnestly request that the ILO provide us with technical assistance for 1994-95 in the field of workers' education.

We consider the Director-General's Reports to be particularly significant and, in particular, we are interested in the Report on Social insurance and social protection.

The Director-General's Report has very clearly touched on the problems currently facing countries today which are going through a transition to a market economy. In Mongolia, the existing system of social security is totally out of date and a new system has not yet been developed. The absence of a new properly developed mechanism for social protection has placed pensioners and state officials in an extremely difficult position as prices are being liberalized.

I think that the analysis and conclusions made in the Director-General's Report are of considerable importance for us. We are indeed working with the social partners on a new proposal to provide social protection for workers.

Part-time work and short-term contracts have a considerable impact on employment, on bringing down unemployment, coordinating the working time of workers and their free periods and raising their wages.

We adopted a new Act on labour in Mongolia in 1991, introducing the possibility of part-time work. But we have to point out that due to the transitional period, the economic crisis and for a number of other social and economic reasons, employers have been extremely disinclined to allow part-time work.

We believe that the Conventions and Recommendations being discussed at this session will make an important contribution to finding an equitable solution to problems such as the eradication of discrimination against people working part time, and how to improve working conditions, remuneration, social insurance, compensation, etc.

We also believe it is essential that we adopt the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents. It is our duty to try to avoid such disasters.

Next year, we will be celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO. The organization of workers of Mongolia will draw up a programme of measures related to this event. The Workers' delegation of Mongolia supports the resolution under discussion related to the 75th anniversary celebrations.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASSOUL (representative of the Arab Labour Organization) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should first like to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, which is addressing crucial subjects that deserve our undivided attention: the Report of the Director-General on Social insurance and social protection, which is an important source of information; the Organization's draft budget for the coming biennium, which lays the basis for the ILO's future activities; the special sitting on the Palestinian question that was held last week in an atmosphere of dignity and equanimity; an assessment of the ILO's role in technical cooperation; the question of far-reaching amendments to the Conference's Standing Orders to enhance its effectiveness and efficiency and, lastly, discussion and ratification of important new international instruments designed to strengthen and supplement existing provisions relating to international labour standards.

The Director-General's choice of the subject Social insurance and social protection for his Report is a pertinent one, although it comes somewhat too late inasmuch as the adverse social repercussions of structural adjustment policies and programmes and the transition to a market economy are already clear to see and have had a major impact on the living conditions of large sectors of the population, especially in terms of the scope and level of social protection. Studies and field surveys have shown that these programmes have increased social disparities and weakened the social fabric, since structural adjustment programmes tend to focus on the economic, monetary and financial sectors and to neglect the social dimension, an essential aspect of any serious effort to achieve progress and economic reform. Social progress and economic development must proceed hand in hand with action to promote social justice and social protection, since they are two dimensions of the process of securing well-being for all.

We in the Arab Labour Organization raised this question last year at the Arab Labour Conference from a national Arab standpoint in response to our experience of the inevitable adverse impact of restrictive monetary policies stemming from structural adjustment and economic stabilization policies, which impose harsh financial restrictions such as constraints and ceilings on public spending, reductions in credits from public funds and the lowering of inflation. Our greatest fear – which proved entirely justified – was that spending on social insurance and social protection would be worst hit. And our fears have not abated, given governments' inability – for reasons beyond their control – to raise additional funds to cope with the continual increase in expenditure on social insurance. We also fear that social protection programmes may no longer be given the priority they have at present or that they should be given in national social and economic policies at a time of growing pressure to extend existing systems.

The characteristics of social protection in the Arab world are very similar to those prevailing in other developing countries in terms of problems of coverage, funding, administration, contributions, structures, etc., problems that are becoming increasingly complex owing to the lack of resources and the increase in basic needs. There can be no doubt that all Arab governments without exception are striving to attain advanced levels of protection, given their concern to guarantee human rights and human dignity in line with the humanitarian social philosophy inherent in the traditions, customs and values of Arab society. More than 14 centuries ago, Islam established a system based on the principle of social solidarity. The zakat or alms tax was the instrument it used to address the problems of poverty, infirmity and disease. Under our Arab and Islamic system of values and morals, social protection is treated as the right of each and every individual and not as some kind of charity dispensed by the State.

The Director-General, in his Report, provided an excellent review of the status quo and of existing problems relating to social protection but the ideas and solutions that he proposed in order to meet these challenges fell short of our expectations. We were hoping that the ILO, by virtue of its experience and expertise, would be able to come up with more radical, far-reaching and realistic solutions. We further note that the Report has given far greater attention to problems of social security and social protection networks in the developed countries than to the problems of the developing countries. In particular, it seeks to address the extremely complex task of reconciling economic efficiency with social justice so as to combine economic and social prosperity with social peace.

Having carefully studied the documents of the Governing Body and the Reports of the Director-General, we should like to commend the priorities that the ILO has established for its future work: promotion of democratization, the fight against poverty and the strengthening of social protection for workers. We also appreciate the new vision and the objective approach that have emerged under the wise leadership of Mr. Michel Hansenne, whom we congratulate on his re-election. The new approach involving the pursuit of an active policy of participation in the interests of greater convergence and cohesion among the beneficiaries of the ILO's activities is to be encouraged since it corresponds to a worldwide tendency towards decentralization of administrative functions and structures, the implication being that international bodies should not remain aloof in their ivory towers, working on the basis of idealistic philosophical theories, deprived of direct contact with the problems of their member States and of the necessary continuous interaction with the parties involved. We therefore welcome the setting up of multidisciplinary teams, which will work in the Arab countries and whose activities we intend to support in order to benefit to the full from their skills, experience and expertise. We in the Arab Labour Organization have set ourselves the same goals as the ILO, above all the spread of social justice among the Arab social partners, that is to say Arab labour administrations and workers' and employers' organizations. We are aware that our needs are constantly growing while our funds are limited. Great care must therefore be taken in spending those funds so as to achieve as much as possible with as little as possible.

In conclusion, I wish to say that we in the Arab Labour Organization are following with great interest the preparations for the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. We take this opportunity to assure all those working at the ILO that the Arab world supports their efforts to ensure that this dual event lives up to our expectations of your Organization and does justice to its lofty principles and goals. We hope that the basic rights and freedoms to which all the peoples of the region aspire, in particular the Palestinian people, will be placed at the centre of the celebrations, in application of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which proclaims, inter alia, the right of all human beings to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development.

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! As a proud representative of the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to express my views and those of my colleagues and the workers' organizations of my country concerning the Director-General's Report to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I hope that it will lay down specific and concrete guidelines for the creation of a sound social security and social protection system suitable for the world of work.

First of all, I would like to join earlier speakers in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election. I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne on his election for a second term as Director-General of the ILO. I welcome the new member States which have joined the Organization, especially the Government of the brave and innocent people of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Social security is not a new phenomenon. It originated as early as in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and spread among the developing countries after the Second World War. But Islam introduced this concept more than 1,400 years ago. I would like to explore this dimension briefly for the distinguished delegates attending this Conference and for the ILO experts.

The concept of social security is based on a very fundamental value, which has somehow been either neglected or denied even in the Western secular approach to economics. The concepts of rabb and rububiya – that there is a God who has created this universe with a purpose and that the universe is capable of providing sustenance for mankind. God has provided all that is needed for the welfare, growth and well-being of mankind. What is needed is the right effort, proper and just distribution and effective organization of society.

The institution of the family, which is a divinely ordained institution, is the starting point of the Islamic social security system. It enables the new generation to acquire the values, the culture, the arts, the skills and the crafts of society.

Along with the family, there is also an institution which has customarily been called the "aqela", which formerly was a tribe. Islam changes the concept of the tribe into a more rational organization of society, saying that beyond the family each locality is a distinct entity in its own right. And it has a moral, political and economic responsibility. The Islamic concept of social security is not confined to support for the disabled, looking after the elderly or providing some kind of a pension for the retired. It starts from the day a person is born with the aim of making him or her a useful, active member of society. What part has to be played by parents and what part has to be played by the State?

We also believe that the implementation of a sound social security system is an enormous but not an impossible task. Although committed to this goal, the ILO cannot act alone but, as stated in the final communiqué of the 13th Conference of Asian and Pacific Labour Ministers, there is a need for the ILO to step up its dialogue with the IMF and the World Bank and to call on governments to ensure that the social dimension of economic policies, including structural adjustment, is always taken into account.

The salient features of the Director-General's Report, which are quite notable and admirable, are as follows: the emphasis placed on the correlation between social protection, stability and development; identification and availability of social protection as a basic and fundamental right of individuals; the emphasis placed on the relationship between employment and social security; and identification of basic differences between the conditions and problems of developed and developing countries.

Keeping in view the above facts, the Director-General's Report has unfortunately not been able to present the factual issues in this connection. For example, more than 110 developing countries are currently in the process of adopting structural adjustment programmes, which have been directly or indirectly imposed by the IMF and the World Bank. It is our firm conviction that the main characteristic of these programmes is that they are, in the first instance, antihuman because they deny basic human rights and put them at the disposal of capital and capitalists. Secondly, in the social context, they are detrimental to the weak and poor people in society and put them under further pressure.

The implementation of the structural adjustment programmes prescribed by the IMF and the World Bank means that government expenditure on subsidies for basic human needs such as food, clothing, education, health care, etc., is eliminated or reduced. This is happening at a time when the measures inherent in these programmes such as privatization, devaluation of the national currency and the transition to an open market economy result in the transfer of an even greater amount of subsidies to local and foreign investors.

In addition, due to the inflationary characteristics of adjustment programmes, the prevailing unsatisfactory social security systems in developing countries are further devastated. The concurrent pressures from severe price hikes and extensive retrenchment of the labour force makes it quite difficult for workers to earn a decent living.

It has been clearly stated in the Director-General's Report that the prevailing social security system in the developing countries covers only the formal sector, which is far from ideal, since this sector comprises only a little more than 10 per cent of the total employed population.

Bearing in mind the extraordinary importance of the above problems in the fate and life of the workers, the question arises as to why these problems have not been extensively covered in the Director-General's Report.

Secondly, given that more than 110 countries are in the process of implementing structural adjustment programmes, why has the Director-General's Report not dealt more extensively with the repercussions of such policies?

Thirdly, why has the outcome of the high-level meeting of 1987 between the ILO, the IMF and the World Bank not been mentioned in the Report?

Lastly, assuming that the fate of the millions of people who are exposed to the repercussions of structural adjustment programmes is very important for the ILO, we wonder why no technical committee has been provided for on the agenda of this year's session of the Conference to deal with social security and other problems relating to the implementation of such policies.

The workers' organization of the Islamic Republic of Iran wishes to seriously urge the Director-General to take steps to ensure that, firstly, further assistance in the fields of education, training and self-employment is given to countries undergoing structural adjustment programmes. Secondly, exclusive research should be conducted by ILO experts and appropriate research centres on every individual measure of structural adjustment so that the impact in terms of retrenchment, poverty and other repercussions is clearly specified.

Furthermore, financial and further technical assistance should be provided to independent workers' organizations and federations so that they can find a suitable solution for the said problems on the basis of full knowledge of the facts.

Lastly, all the facilities of the ILO must be utilized in such a way that the pressure faced by unorganized workers in informal sectors is duly identified and ways to overcome them are also clearly specified.

In conclusion, I wish to draw your attention to a subject mentioned in the annual survey of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in connection with the workers' organization in Iran, which is totally false and baseless. The source of this news is a terrorist organization which, according to international documents, is responsible for the massacre of the Kurd and Iranian people and has taken an active part in the war against the people of Kuwait.

The question arises as to how an international confederation can allow itself to become a tool in the hands of a terrorist organization and question the sovereignty of an independent workers' organization?

Although we have reported the matter to the Director-General of the ILO and requested urgent follow-up, we reserve our legal right to follow up the matter through a competent authority. We also announce our readiness to welcome an ILO delegation for clarification of the truth for all the free workers of the world.

Mrs. AERENLUND (Workers' delegate, Denmark) – On behalf of the Danish Confederation of Trade Unions, I wish to thank the Director-General for the excellent Report which gives us a prominent basis for dialogue on these important issues. It is with great pleasure that I comment on the Report as a response to the Director-General's call for comments. I would also like to take the liberty to make a few suggestions to that effect.

I very much agree with the Director-General that access to social protection is a basic human right and that the ILO cannot act alone in this respect. The task is an enormous one which is bound by a number of constraints, but the task is not impossible.

I also support the agenda for a strategy on how to overcome some of the major constraints if social protection is to become more meaningful to a wider section of the world population. I particularly endorse the need for consensus between the respective governments and the social partners on the social schemes and the funding and administration thereof. In his conclusions the Director-General asks how long it will take to achieve the goals, and he gives the answer himself: "We cannot tell! In the developed countries the evolution from social insurance to social protection has spanned nearly a century. In the developing world this process must be compressed into a much shorter time." This is very true!

But social protection and social insurance demand high social expenditure and the lion's part of any state budget, irrespective of supplementary contributions made by the social partners.

And here we are at the very core of this complex problem. In my analysis there are two decisive trends which are contradictory and therefore constitute a hindrance to the realization of our common goals.

The one trend is constructive and positive and can be identified as the Director-General's strategy for coordinated action by the social partners and the respective governments along with greater policy cohesion between agencies of the UN family and the Bretton Woods institutions.

The other trend is for the moment destructive and blocks the Director-General's strategy for achieving the goals. This trend can be identified as the short-term and most unwanted effects of the structural adjustment programmes of the World Bank and the IMF.

Many governments have introduced wage freezes or compulsory guidelines for wage increases on the pretext that they have been part of the conditions of the IMF and the World Bank for granting loans and other support. Similarly, in many cases labour rights and legislation have been revised in order to weaken the trade unions. The public sector has been considerably reduced, subsidies to secure stable food prices have been removed, all to the detriment and suffering of the populations and undermining the governments. And exactly the same model has been applied in all countries, whether in Eastern Europe or in Africa. It is also characteristic that the social partners are never consulted. Lately, it has emerged that in some French-speaking countries of Africa the World Bank has engaged consultants whose recommendations for labour legislation reforms have been strongly opposed by the trade unions. It has to be underlined that the ILO was not approached by the World Bank to provide advice. And also the ILO appears reluctant to assert its competence in this area.

In short, many countries undergoing the medical cures of the structural programmes suffer from the short-term effects of such programmes. To this should be added that there are few signs of the long-promised economic recovery. The point is that it seems as if the structural adjustment programmes only make sense on paper. One could also use the old saying that the operation was successful but the patient died. And this certainly does not form a basis for the improvement of social insurance and social protection as called for in the Director-General's Report.

What can the ILO do about this state of affairs? Well, first and foremost, it would be fair to say that the ILO is already doing something about it on the international level, in the regions and with the multidisciplinary teams which it is planned to operate in various countries.

But there are too many "buts" and "may-bes" in the ILO approach to reduce the harassment to the populations caused by the present structural adjustment programmes which are focusing all too narrowly on the monetary stability of the respective countries.

I would therefore urge the Director-General to be much more audacious and affirmative in his approach towards the World Bank and the IMF and to ensure that the social partners are involved in the consultations on international, regional and national levels. The ILO has something to offer which is unique: its expertise in labour market issues, employment creation and the involvement of the social partners as a precondition for long-term success.

Experience from all over the world demonstrates that the most successful and productive economies are built on tripartism and a stable industrial relations system.

I myself have the honour to represent the labour movement of Denmark where tripartism is taken seriously by the Government and both sides of industry with due respect for the natural differences of interest. This gives us a basis for decent social protection and social insurance schemes which are so necessary in any unemployment situation.

It also provides the basis for allowing Denmark to be one of the major donors to the ILO programmes.

If my fellow colleagues from the developed world are taking their responsibility and the call of the Director-General seriously, I would encourage them to seek to increase their contributions to the ILO.

Next year the ILO will be celebrating its 75th anniversary. For the image of the ILO I think it would be wonderful if we could all see signs of the impact of the ILO, including its impact on the Bretton Woods institutions, without using a magnifying glass.

The ILO should not just be humble, but, like the widow in the Bible, be persistent in knocking at the door of the World Bank and the IMF to make them include the social dimension in structural adjustment programmes. The ILO must assert its rights on behalf of women, children and the weak of the world, for the benefit of the world. We wish to see a strong ILO.

RECORD VOTE ON THE RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADOPTION OF THE PROGRAMME AND BUDGET FOR 1994-95 AND THE ALLOCATION OF THE BUDGET OF INCOME AMONG MEMBER STATES

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the second item on our agenda, namely the record vote on the resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1994-5 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States. This resolution is to be found in Provisional Record No. 17, page 21.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Original French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The result of the vote is as follows: 380 in favour, 6 against, with 26 abstentions. The quorum is 266.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. GRAY) – The resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Original French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – I would like to explain our vote in connection with the adoption of the budget which has just been approved. I would like to state, on behalf of the Government delegation of Switzerland, that after very careful reflection we finally voted in favour of the Programme and Budget for 1994-95, but we did so without enthusiasm and purely out of concern to preserve the consensus, at least at government level.

Aware of its responsibility, the Government delegation of Switzerland nevertheless wishes to reiterate the questions and serious reservations which it expressed during the discussions of the Finance Committee and which are reflected in the Second Report of that Committee.

The Swiss Government delegation wishes to point out that it has yet to receive satisfactory replies to the concerns it expressed. In the spirit of the speech made in Plenary yesterday by the head of the Swiss Government delegation, we wish to ensure that due consideration is given henceforth to our views.

Original Spanish: Mrs. JIMENEZ (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Mexico) – The Government delegation of Mexico generally endorses the Programme and Budget for 1994-95, but does so to join the consensus, and not without expressing its reservations with regard to the priorities which have been set. The Government of Mexico stressed, on the Governing Body and within the Finance Committee, the need to continue with the priority activities of the Organization in accordance with its terms of reference. The Government of Mexico would like to take this opportunity to reiterate its reservations, and to reaffirm that the Government delegation of Mexico continues to support the principle of stimulating employment, combating poverty and the right to development, as we have said before.

Original French: Mgr. TABET (Apostolic Nuncio, Permanent Observer of the Holy See, Geneva) – Allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their elections, and for the skill with which they have conducted the work of this Conference. I would also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express to Mr. Michel Hansenne the congratulations and best wishes of the Holy See for his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office.

The delegation of the Holy See has read with interest the Director-General's Report, Social insurance and social protection. It feels that it is to the credit of the International Labour Organization and its member States to have contributed to the application of the minimum levels of benefits and coverage which include most of the risks to which workers and their families are exposed throughout their life.

The Holy See appreciates the fact that the criteria proposed for the protection of families, the unemployed, the sick, the elderly or handicapped people, or anyone who finds himself in a situation of vulnerability, extend beyond that of economic profitability.

In this respect, in the century elapsed between the Rerum novarum and Centesimus annus encyclicals, whose importance has been highlighted by many Members of your Organization, successive Popes have emphasized that each human being must be able to benefit in all circumstances from a living standard in keeping with his human dignity.

The slow but successful creation of social protection systems in certain countries, and the beginnings of such systems in other countries, despite a fragile economic situation, are remarkable efforts for the effective application of human rights.

The successes of these systems, however, should not make us lose sight of their limits or failures, or of the absence of a genuine social protection in many developing countries. The Director-General carefully described the reasons for disparities in the capacity of countries to protect the most disadvantaged and their families, bringing us face to face once again with the burning issue of poverty, so closely related to that of labour and to the grave situation of employment.

My delegation fully endorses the Director-General's conclusions regarding the need to give priority to the broadest social protection, particularly in developing countries. Social expenditures merit all due attention, for humanitarian reasons, of course, but also because of economic necessity, to the extent that real growth depends on the development of all human resources.

Social ambition is at the very heart of development objectives; its aim is to ensure that no one is left by the wayside. No society can allow itself to create outsiders.

This is why the existence of poverty cannot dispense a State, whose mission is precisely to safeguard a minimum standard of living for the population as a whole, from setting up a social protection scheme as a major instrument to fight poverty. To be able to guarantee adequate social protection, all countries, and particularly the poorest, such as those of Africa, need more than ever not to be prevented by the wealthier States from participating fairly in overall economic development.

The International Labour Organization has in this respect the decisive responsibility to help States and the international community not to lose sight of the requirements of the poor, and of the responsibility to provide them with both social protection and the chance to obtain employment. This concern will no doubt be submitted to the World Summit for Social Development, thus focusing attention on the interdependence of economic and social policy.

The Director-General is quite right in affirming that social protection is above all the responsibility of the community and rests on the willingness of each individual to participate in the care of the most underprivileged. In our opinion, the ILO is essentially responsible for assisting the international community and individual States to foster solidarity and sharing between the haves and the have-nots. By encouraging social dialogue it attempts to allow all to participate in development, and to ensure that no global action is undertaken without taking into account the requirements and the expectations of people.

Tripartism and the practice of social dialogue only have a genuine meaning if the poor are also invited to participate. The participation of the poor – and let us remember that they have a face, that of women, children, the unemployed, migrants – is a requirement which is addressed both to governments and to the heads of undertakings and trade unions. The poor knock on our door and make specific demands that this Organization cannot ignore.

This requirement is everybody's business, if my delegation understood correctly the pertinent appeal made by Director-General, which I quote: "measures other than conventional measures of formal social security need to be tried. In particular, governments should endeavour to support any and all social groups which are able to provide the necessary framework of social solidarity and mutual insurance and protection. Such groups might include local communities, cooperatives, religious organizations, friendly societies or other ad hoc organizations.(...) In addition, every effort will need to be made to make use of the extended family, and to reinforce what is in effect the default means of social protection for by far the greater part of the world's population". Allow me to underline my delegation's agreement on this point.

Technical cooperation provides the ILO with an efficient means to carry out such a responsibility by contributing to the promotion of the most disadvantaged of workers. My delegation welcomes the fact that this technical cooperation bears on three major fields; the progress of democracy, the fight against poverty, the protection of workers, particularly through the promotion of employment, as a key component of general development.

More generally, it is important to recall that the ILO currently has a mission to mobilize world opinion and bring serious attention to focus on the crucial question of the exclusion of the poor, and actively to seek solutions.

The twentieth century has witnessed the discovery and the most wide-ranging formulation of human rights. Our task, at the threshold of the twenty-first century, appears to be that of furthering the compliance of States, of all the bodies which composes States, and of all men and women with their social duties. The interdependence of the world economy must encourage us to enable humankind to become more united and to respond more effectively to the challenges it faces. It is at a world level that we are called upon to make solidarity real and to share. Can we envisage a new social pact at the world level? Is not that precisely the mandate conferred upon the ILO by the international community and the peoples of the world who still have faith in this Organization?

Original Arabic: Mr. JILANI (Employers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a pleasure for me on behalf of the employers of Tunisia and on my own behalf to express our heartfelt congratulations to the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference. I would also like to wish him every success in conducting our work with the assistance of the distinguished vice-presidents.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for having tackled the most important aspects of the theme of this session, which he presented to us in a very objective and comprehensive manner, despite the complexity and the sensitiveness of the subject.

Nature has not granted Tunisia mineral or oil resources. After independence we started to develop our country with the only capital we had available, that is to say our human resources. The fundamental thrust of all our development plans has always been the glory and dignity of Tunisia. Our ultimate objective in all our development activities has been a life of dignity for all Tunisian citizens, wherever they may be and whatever their social and professional status. Among the earliest revolutionary legislative acts promulgated by the Government of independence was a law to ensure general and compulsory social protection for all workers, whatever their sector of activity or income.

Three national funds were thus established: the national pensions and social welfare fund, the national social security fund and the national fund for the elderly. These three funds ensured social coverage for all categories of workers in the private and public sectors. Without explaining in detail how these funds work, I would like to make the following two comments.

The majority of social protection systems in Tunisia have the following common aims: to provide for a secure retirement, taking into account the period of economic activity and level of income prior to retirement of the worker; to provide free medical care for the wage-earner and his or her family, and to provide family allowances to workers in accordance with the conditions and decisions of the nation, including in particular a limit on the number of children who benefit from children's allowances, in accordance with the national family planning and demographic growth policy.

Since the positive changes which started in 1987 in Tunisia, there have been several improvements in the social protection system in order to ensure that it provides generalized coverage. It has been extended to new categories of workers, such as farmers and independent workers. New benefits and allowances have also been created. The conditions for entitlement under the social security system have been made easier to fulfil, the level of benefits has been raised and an effort has been made to make the benefits more accessible to those insured.

The present social security policy is based on the following three principles: to extend the scope of social protection; to develop services; and to maintain the financial balance in the social security systems so they can respond at present and in the future to the financial challenges they now face and to those that lie ahead. We also must strengthen international cooperation, especially with countries which host Tunisian communities.

As a representative of the employers' organization of Tunisia, I would like to stress the important role played by this association in guaranteeing social protection for workers despite the high cost involved. To indicate clearly what this role is, suffice it to say that the institution's total level of social expenditure, including contributions to the social security fund or the various funds which deal with assisted housing, compensation for industrial accidents and other forms of social benefits varies from one sector to another somewhere between 40 and 60 per cent of the total income. This figure reflects the level of policy of solidarity which Tunisia has opted for and which it continues to consolidate in order to protect our human capital. This policy has led at the level of competition between enterprises to certain problems whereas a large number of countries who are our competitors have not as yet reached such levels. Against this background the ILO could play an efficient and effective role in encouraging many countries to apply a homogeneous policy of social protection, guaranteeing a minimum of social cover. Tunisia has based its social security policy on the recommendations of the ILO and on the main themes of its general policy, which can now be seen in the policies adopted since the changes in 1987, namely in terms of respect for the individual and human rights. There aspects are rooted in our Islamic culture and in our ancient civilization.

As one of the representatives of a developing country, might I be allowed to draw particular attention to a very important and serious matter – that is the question of industrial accidents which cannot be divorced from the whole issue of social protection and social security. Nationally and internationally, I think the statistics all point to a very high percentage of industrial accidents recorded in the newly industrialized developing countries, and the serious social and financial losses which ensue for the workers and in terms of the financial strain thus placed on economic institutions and social security funds.

Some attribute this to the poor level of vocational qualifications among workers and a lack of adequate vocational training in the newly industrialized countries together with an inability to master new technologies. There is some truth in that. However, the real reason we believe lies in the blatant shortcomings in safety standards and conditions with regard to the machinery provided by producers to poor countries. Some manufacturers do this to reduce the cost of their equipment to the developing countries where entrepreneurs are obliged to accept this because of their limited resources. That is why from this rostrum, we should appeal to the manufactures to include safety and preventive mechanisms in their basic machinery, which must also extend to spare parts and accessories.

In conclusion, I would like to underline the vast and noble concept of social security which should not be confined only to solidarity with certain categories of persons or certain age groups within a society. All humanity, and groups of people, whether in the form of a State, an economic or political bloc should apply these principles. And, the peoples of developing countries and deprived communities should be given understanding and support by those in rich countries. I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate my thanks to the Organization, and the Director-General, for the important role still played in finding common ground between varying points of view and classes and in providing a forum for dialogue and consultation on important subjects facing the Organization and I wish every success to this session.

Original Russian: Mr. BADEY (Government delegate, Belarus) – May I warmly extend greetings to you on behalf of the Government and delegation of the Republic of Belarus at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. We welcome all the new Members of the International Labour Organization. The ideals and principles of the ILO have always appealed, and remain appealing, to a growing number of people. It is worth noting that the authority and the strength of this Organization have been growing in recent years thanks to a great extent to the attentive and creative work of the International Labour Office headed by the Director-General. The content of the Director-General's Reports for the 78th, 79th and 80th Sessions confirm this.

Mr. Hansenne, please accept the congratulations of the Government of the Republic of Belarus on your re-election to the high post of director of the Office. We consider this recognition and support for the policy conducted under your leadership and we wish you, and through you all the staff of the Office, fruitful work for the benefit of peace, democracy and progress.

The questions of social security and social protection of the population put before this session are at the centre of attention of the Government and social partners in Belarus. They are of concern to all people regardless of where they work, and irrespective of age.

In order to resolve them, the Government together with the employers' and the trade union organizations has worked out and introduced the system of social protection for the population. The basis for it are new laws, such as the Act concerning the indexation of the population's income with inflation, the Act on minimum consumer budgets, the Act concerning minimum wages and state guarantees in the field of labour, the Act concerning pensions, the Act concerning the social protection of military personnel and members of their families, the Act concerning state benefits for families with children, and the Act concerning employment, just to name a few.

The updated social protection system which is better designed and more precisely defined, provides guarantees to all citizens, and particularly those who for one reason or another are unable to compete on the labour market.

But even the best system can only give results if it is supported by adequate financial resources. Unfortunately, in our country, the volume of resources is constantly dropping for various reasons. In just two years the national income of the Republic has dropped by 15 per cent, and the drop in production is continuing. Therefore, we see the improvement of social protection and the social sphere as something related to economic stabilization and, later, to economic development.

One of the main causes of the economic crisis is, without any doubt, the labour crisis caused by the imperfect industrial relations that were inherent in the centralized system and that still remain to a considerable extent. This is a system where only about 20 per cent of the national income is distributed according to the results of the work done. Sooner or later it was bound to lead to a massive loss of interest in work. And that is why, while supporting the principles of social justice and solidarity, we are paying particular attention to changing the mentality that has grown up over years of social dependency and uniform remuneration levels. For this purpose we are adopting measures to improve our labour legislation and system of social security and to fundamentally revamp the system of remuneration so that the results of work should be the main source of welfare for the economically active population. Strengthening incentive in no way means violating the rights of either trade unions or (all the more so) workers. On the contrary, increasing the resources directed for the payment of labour and reducing deductions at source, in our view, should become an important element of social protection for those who work conscientiously and creatively.

In this way, we relate the solving of the problems of social protection with the efficiency and productivity of the economy. That is the material basis for ensuring social justice and the protection of those who are in vulnerable positions.

We are grateful to the members of the following departments for the assistance they have given as Belarus perfected its labour laws and regulations: the Regional Office for Europe, the Labour Law and Labour Relations Branch, and the Working Conditions and Environment Branch.

The seminars held in Cyprus and Minsk on labour administration and the prevention of major industrial accidents were extremely timely and highly useful for the work of my Ministry. We discussed the concept of a new Labour Code for the Republic of Belarus, and we took the decision to set up the state labour inspection service, which is now being established. These are just a few of the concrete results of that cooperation.

Our delegation supports the adoption of a Convention on the prevention of major industrial accidents. We consider that this is a very necessary document.

Another element in the social protection of the population is employment. Gone are the days of so-called full employment in our country. The number of registered unemployed people is already more than 1 per cent of the workforce. There is a considerable amount of hidden unemployment. Many enterprises face a worsening financial position as a result of the rapid increase in energy costs, the disruption of economic links caused by the collapse of the USSR, conversion and restructuring. This could very soon lead to considerable difficulties for many of our citizens.

As we denationalize and privatize establishments, and given the shortage of investment capital, the creation of new jobs at state enterprises is hardly a realistic proposition. The only realistic way of solving the problem of unemployment is to develop entrepreneurship, flexible employment and self-employment. We are grateful to the Entrepreneurship and Management Development Branch and the Training Department for holding seminars on the development of small businesses, on productivity and on self-employment in rural areas. They were extremely useful. However, we believe the ILO, with its exceptional knowledge and experience in systematic approach to solving the problems of unemployment and the development of enterprises and cooperatives, is far from fulfilling its potential. It confines itself to consulting services. And therefore we think that it would be advisable to direct the work of the appropriate departments to developing and implementing concrete projects to support small business and regional development.

It is extremely important for us to resolve the problem of employment in the areas where we have group resettlement of people displaced by the Chernobyl disaster, and also those remaining in the territory of former cantonments. We are also worried about labour migration problems, and we would like to request that the ILO give us assistance in developing and implementing appropriate projects.

In our view, increased resources should be allocated from the ILO budget for these purposes.

In this connection, there is another idea I would like to put forward. To coordinate the ILO's activities in different countries of Central and Eastern Europe, a multidisciplinary team should be established in Budapest. However, links with the countries of the former USSR are practically non-existent, unfortunately. Therefore we think it would be advisable to set up a special ILO centre for the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

There is another question that we think deserves the attention of the ILO. It concerns the training and retraining of staff working in social security and labour bodies and the development of human resources as a whole.

For this purpose, we have set up a special centre in Minsk to train workers in social and labour relations. Unfortunately, our country lacks qualified instructors and teaching staff who know about market relations, and we have not drawn up the necessary curricula or determined the skills needed to rectify the situation. Therefore, assistance from the Turin Centre, the Training Department and the Ministries of Labour of developed countries would be welcomed and of great benefit.

Original Arabic: Mr. MATTAR (Employers' delegate, United Arab Emirates) – Peace be with you! It is a pleasure for me to address this Conference on behalf of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates. It is also my pleasure to begin by congratulating Mr. Abdel-Hak, the Minister of Manpower and Training of the Arab Republic of Egypt, on his election as President of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am pleased also to congratulate the Vice-Presidents of the three Groups, and I would also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his re-election to a second term of office.

The agenda of this Conference includes a large number of important subjects. The Director-General's Report is made up of two parts. The first part deals with social insurance and social protection schemes in the member States, and the ILO's role in improving those schemes. The second part describes the Organization's activities during 1992. We also have the Reports of the Governing Body, the reports on technical cooperation, the prevention of major industrial accidents, part-time work, the application of Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions, and other topics. We are sure that this Conference, in which the three social partners of government, employers and workers are represented, will reach positive results on all the issues on its agenda, to the mutual benefit of the social partners.

I would like to express the appreciation of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates for the Report of the Director-General and what it has to say on social insurance and social protection. We are gratified by the proposals formulated in the Report, which aim to develop social insurance and social protection systems, and support the activities of parties concerned through the ILO's expertise in this field.

The Director-General's Report on the activities of the Organization in 1992 includes a comprehensive description of its activities in different parts of the world.

The United Arab Emirates have been able with unprecedented speed to establish a modern labour relations system. These relations are based on the protection by the State of the workers within its territory, and this is achieved by labour legislation conforming to the most advanced international labour standards. The legislation also provides for various benefits on termination of employment and requires employers to pay generous compensation at the end of a contract of a year or more. It allows workers to choose between such compensation or a retirement pension, depending on which is best for the worker concerned. It affirms workers' rights to medical care in the event of accidents and occupational illness. The many benefits and generous working conditions have made our country very attractive to foreign workers and an oasis of peace and security for a large number of workers from brother and friendly countries. The legislation guarantees the right to work, to invest and to transfer earnings abroad without restriction.

The Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates has excellent relations with the ILO, and we look forward to more cooperation in the different fields of labour in the coming years.

Finally, I hope that your Conference will adopt resolutions and recommendations which will enhance the role of the Organization in developing programmes to assist member countries in all areas of development, and more particularly to help them find solutions appropriate to the tragic situations we observe in many parts of the world, where there have been great losses of innocent lives and resources. We appeal for help to be given to the Somali people to end its suffering and to bring stability to that country, so that they can take their place again in the international community. We also appeal for help for the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to stop the atrocities perpetrated by the Serbs in killing, torturing and raping innocent people. Such acts are a violation of the most basic human rights and a challenge to international law.

Mr. ACHMAD (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – Firstly, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the President of the 80th Session of this time-honoured International Labour Conference on his election. I fully believe that he will be able to preside successfully over all our sessions and lead them to a productive outcome.

I would also like to express the appreciation of Indonesia's workers in respect of the matters placed on the agenda for consideration and discussion by all the delegates, namely the issues of social security, major industrial accidents and the problem of part-time work. And this not only because these topics are of global concern, but more particularly because they represent some of the issues most widely discussed by the workers as well as by the Indonesia Workers' Union (SPSI) and those in which they have been striving for improvement.

Secondly, I would like to share with you some of the Indonesian workers' experiences and positions with regard to these three issues.

The Government of Indonesia has recently promulgated an improved law on social security and a law on pension schemes. The law on social security has a wider scope than that of ASTEK, the former workers' insurance covering occupational accidents, medical care and death allowance for workers. These two laws provide much better protection for workers, both in the private and in the government sectors. In addition, the enactment of the social security law has reflected the involvement of the tripartite body right from the preliminary draft, through the hearing in Parliament and into the formulation of the "Implementing Decree". The tripartite body has participated not only in the drafting of the two laws, but also in the supervision of their enforcement. Workers and employers are also represented on the Supervisory Board. At present, with the full participation of the SPSI, which represents the Indonesian workers, these new laws are being explained and implemented throughout Indonesia. The SPSI's National Executive Board has played a major role in proposing some of the measures contained in the two draft laws for the benefit of the workers, as well as those of other laws, such as the Transportation Act, which provides for the protection of the workers on their way to and from work. In respect of Act No. 3/1992 concerning the Workers' Social Security Programme, the SPSI has striven for this law to provide better cover for workers. Similarly, the Land Transportation Act not only applies to workers on their journey to and from work, but also to the general public in the event of traffic accidents. With the Act on Pension Schemes, Indonesian workers in the private sector may now feel secure because their future is guaranteed. Formerly, only the armed forces and the civil servants had pensions.

As far as major industrial accidents are concerned, the Indonesian workers have been participating actively in the shop-floor committee on occupational safety and health.

The occupational safety and health programme is one of the high-priority programmes of the National Executive Board of the SPSI. This is a programme aimed at making workers aware of their responsibilities in the prevention of industrial accidents at their place of work.

To date, the ILO has trained 16 occupational safety and health officers. These training officers have participated in ILO-sponsored seminars at both national and regional levels and some have even received advanced level training at the ILO training centre in Turin. Last year the SPSI conducted occupational safety and health surveys and training in 23 companies, involving 573 rank-and-file workers.

Current figures for the total population of Indonesia are now around 180 million. With a growth of 1.9 per cent a year, according to projected forecasts the population will reach 183 million in 1993. The total active workforce is estimated at around 77 million, while over 50 per cent of this workforce is between the ages of 15 and 34. Women make up about 40 per cent of the workforce.

The normal working week in Indonesia is 45 hours and out of our current total workforce 30 million are considered part-time workers as they work less than the usual 45 hours: more than 2 million work less than nine hours a week; 47.2 per cent work ten to 24 hours a week; 41.5 per cent work 25-34 hours a week; and 4 per cent are not working.

Bearing in mind the difficulties involved in protecting part-time workers, we would strongly support any effort to adopt a Convention which were to address this particular programme.

In conclusion, it is our greatest hope that this session of the Conference this year will adopt Recommendations, or even maybe Conventions, which will take into account more effectively the problems to which we shall be committing our attention as we examine our agenda.

Original Spanish: Mr. DE LOS REYES (Employers' delegate, Cuba) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to conduct the work of this session of the International Labour Conference and to extend these congratulations to the Vice-Presidents who I know will ensure that our work makes a positive contribution to the labour world. Likewise, we wish to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the ILO.

When we examine, as is customary, the Report drawn up for the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, we are struck by the topic which is put forward for our consideration and analysis. This is the subject of social insurance and social protection within member States, a vital issue for thousands of millions of workers who in different parts of the world produce wealth. Out of these workers a considerable one in a hundred is unprotected or suffers from constraints in gaining access to benefits assigned. In the same way, the funds set aside for this purpose are sometimes mishandled in ways which lead to the enrichment of people and even of transnational entities.

In Cuba social security and social protection are given priority and comprehensive attention. In the pre-revolutionary period policy in this sector was catastrophic for thousands of workers. The resources of the funds or institution were used to make investments which in no way benefited the workers. There were constant swindles by those responsible for the funds, politicians of that time and trade union leaders. Monetary benefits were derisory and significantly a considerable 1 per cent of the workers was not included in social security schemes. This situation changed substantially with the triumph of the revolution to the point where some analysts questioned whether there was a relationship between overall social production and the budgetary allocations set aside for social security and social protection. In 1959, 114.3 million pesos were assigned for this purpose; and in 1992 the figure was 1,528.6 million. These data speak for themselves.

The scope of social security and protection in Cuba is all-embracing. All manual and white-collar workers are covered by the law. Education is free as is medical care. Housing is built for people who previously lived in subhuman conditions. There has been a massive development of sports which enabled us to obtain fifth place at the Barcelona Olympics. As a crowning achievement we have reduced the infant mortality rate to below 10.2 per thousand live births and increased life expectancy at birth to 75.7 years. Both indicators put us on an equal footing with the developed countries. If we compare these data with the year 1959, the picture was indeed alarming at that time: an infant mortality rate of 60 per thousand births and a life expectancy of 55 years. The figures are proof of the social dimension of the Cuban revolution.

In the economic field we are still faced with an even more difficult situation. The disadjustment encountered following the disappearance of the USSR and the socialist countries seriously damaged the economic structures of our country, since our investment in development and more than 80 per cent of economic and commercial relations were carried out under mutually favourable conditions with those countries. An essential aspect of our trade with these countries lay in the supply of oil from the USSR, which reached some 13 million tonnes per annum. We thus had to reduce the imports of crude to 6 million tonnes, which had a considerable effect on the production of energy and led to the paralysing of industries, restrictions on agriculture, services and benefits for our population. Similarly, the substantial reduction in the import of fertilizers has had repercussions on sugar production, our main export item, which this year fell to one of the lowest levels in tonnes since the triumph of the revolution. The oil shortage was compounded by a lack of spare parts and unfavourable climatic conditions.

Faced with this adverse economic situation, we have been taking measures to re-establish our development and economic stability. The outlook – based on our own efforts – is promising. We have worked to readjust our economic and commercial relations since we have ties with more than 3,000 firms in 84 countries. Our economic links with bodies in the Latin American, Caribbean and European countries are constantly increasing with the establishment of joint companies, cooperatives, participation accounts and the administration of hotels. These associations cover all sectors of the economy, for example oil prospection with the participation of bodies from France, Canada and Sweden, or in nickel, the textile sector, the construction industry, to give just a few examples.

The two special years which we have experienced have affected the standard of living of our society. However, we expect to achieve more favourable results from 1994, with a relaunching of the Cuban economy based on a timid recovery which, when stabilized, will lead to a sustained growth in overall production through our own individual efforts and obtained through the consolidated achievement of 34 years of revolution on behalf of the technical and vocational education and training of the workers. Our people all receive a minimum schooling of ten years and thousands have graduated as engineers, doctors, technicians and skilled workers.

This relaunching will be backed by an improved sugar harvest, an increase in the national production of oil, which this year will be around 1.3 million tonnes, a rise in tourism, which last year increased by 32 per cent over 1991, with more than 500,000 tourists from Latin America, the Caribbean and Europe (it is estimated that this year the figure will be the same or higher), the stabilization of nickel production with a guaranteed market, a maturing of joint ventures in their different forms and which will provide raw materials, financing, markets and know-how.

Likewise, the biotechnological, medical and pharmaceutical industries will contribute to this recovery through the development of health tourism, with hospital installations with recognized doctors in different specializations and more than 200 biotechnological products, such as PPG, which combats aggressive cholesterol, interferon, injections against meningococci, hepatitis B, the growth factor used for the quick healing of burns, to give a few examples. And finally, the situation will improve as regards the processing of food production with the guarantee of the necessary inputs, in particular fertilizers and seeds.

In the midst of all these efforts, we have to cope with the economic blockage imposed on us by our powerful neighbour more than 32 years ago, and which has now been stepped up through the well-known Torriceli law which has in fact converted the blockage into an economic war against our country. The Torriceli law, a brutal and criminal legal act which, given its extra-territorial scope, deserves the unanimous rejection of the governments of Latin America, Europe and Asia. This law stipulates that subsidiaries of parent companies may not trade with our country. If this provision were to be applied it would have serious consequences, since the United States Treasury Department itself recognized that in 1991 United States subsidiaries located in various countries traded with Cuba to the tune of $718 million, with trade going in both directions.

Thus the biggest island of the Antilles, the lighthouse of the Caribbean, the green crocodile looks towards the future. Tomorrow will certainly be better. Because the efforts will be our own.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDULLA (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me, on behalf of the General Federation of Workers of Bahrain and in my own name, to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that the confidence placed in him by the Conference and his experience will ensure that this session is crowned with success.

I would like to express a special word of warm thanks to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for having selected the subject of Social insurance and social protection as the main subject of his Report for this year. This is an important subject, particularly for workers and their families.

Social protection is a basic element of human rights and is indispensable to human welfare. I absolutely agree with the Director-General when he stresses that social protection measures require the greater application of international labour standards by both governments and the social partners. It also requires the support of the ILO at the twofold level of assistance granted to the partners in production for the development of social legislation and in the field of technical cooperation.

However, the ILO cannot work in isolation and cannot continue to work alone to try to achieve the main objectives set by the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), which aims for the extension of social protection systems, particularly in developing countries, without there being greater political cohesion and greater understanding between the Organization, all its standard-setting and regional units, the social partners and the other specialized agencies of the United Nations family, at least in three spheres of social protection.

These three spheres are: old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits; occupational accident insurance; and unemployment benefit.

We fully agree with the point of view of the Director-General concerning the strategic objectives which he has presented to ensure that in the developing countries social protection can come closer to the ideals enshrined in the international labour standards and set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We believe, in this respect, that it is increasingly necessary today to extend the scope of social protection, particularly as regards medical care, invalidity, old age and survivors' pensions, sickness benefit as well as unemployment and maternity benefit and family allowances. The States in which social insurance is restricted to the provision of invalidity, survivors' and old-age benefits and occupational accident coverage should begin to set up a social protection scheme as advocated by Convention No. 102. Moreover, attempts should also be made to extend the scope of social protection to the entire population so that it is not restricted only to workers in the formal public and private sector.

Thirdly, we have to try to ensure that the monetary value of social protection benefits is sufficient to allow workers to enjoy a decent standard of living. Therefore we believe that pensions and benefits should be linked to the cost-of-living index. Social insurance and social protection should provide a minimum income, making it possible for all citizens to enjoy a decent standard of living.

Fourthly, it is also necessary to amend the programmes of economic reform in order to reduce the adverse effects resulting from the elimination of certain elements of social protection, such as subsidies.

May I take this opportunity to refer to social security legislation in Bahrain. We are trying, together with the social partners, to adapt our legislation to international standards.

The many subjects which have been discussed during this session of the International Labour Conference are directly related to the interests of the social partners, they aim at developing communities and at building States through broader dialogue and a greater cohesion. We attach considerable importance to our annual presence at the International Labour Conference.

We are particularly interested in the formulation of standards concerning major industrial accidents, in the role of the ILO in the field of technical cooperation, and in the regulation of part-time work. We would like to reiterate the need to guide the dialogue towards the fundamental principles of the ILO, namely, economic and social justice.

These principles are the following: first of all, part-time work should not replace regular work; second, part-time work should not be seen as a solution to the problem of unemployment; third, enterprises should not profit from cuts in the wages of workers.

As regards the participation of the labour movement in the work of the International Labour Conference, I think it is important for us to draw the attention of the Governing Body to the need to promote workers' activities and to support the activities of our Organization. We hope that our leaders will be able to participate in the various training activities organized by the various institutions in the region, which have become increasingly necessary to complement the developments and needs as regards the protection of workers in accordance with international labour standards.

Ms. HEPTONSTALL (representative of the International Council on Social Welfare) – First of all I would like to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and all the other officers of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference on their election and the conduct of these meetings. I also wish to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election.

I am taking the floor in the name of the International Council of Social Welfare, a non-governmental organization in official relations with the ILO, and as convenor of the Geneva-based NGO Working Group on Women and Employment, whose members are all in consultative status with the United Nations Economic and Social Council.

We welcome the Report of the Director-General with its comprehensive overview and discussion of the issues facing member countries. Social insurance and social protection do not stand alone, but function in relation to the state of the economy and the labour market, so the questions that must be addressed regarding equity, equality and adequacy are especially acute during a period of world economic slowdown. For these reasons, it is also important to examine the Report from a gender perspective, and the Report is rather surprisingly wanting in this regard.

Statutory social schemes provide important benefits as the Director-General points out on page 5: "a reasonable social net for all individuals and households enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and to accept change, and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability". However, if such schemes are to fully achieve their objectives for men and women certain issues must be addressed.

Statutory social protection schemes are relatively recent in origin, and have appeared in response to the needs of an industrialized society. When they were created, social security focused primarily on the male breadwinner of the family, employed in the formal sector, and women were treated primarily as dependants, whose benefits were derived from those of the male breadwinner. Changing family patterns, including rising divorce rates, a greater number of working women and increasing numbers of female-headed households, have made obsolete this concept of women as mere dependants. There is now a growing consensus on the need for women to accumulate social security entitlements in their own right, rather than acquiring them from married status or family circumstances. But this, of course, remains a difficult area.

Although statutory social security systems functioning in the formal economy have largely eliminated sexual discrimination, this has not solved the problem of income security faced by women of all ages, especially older women.

The situation is especially painful for those living in countries undergoing structural adjustment or confronted with economies in transition. There are many reasons for this. Women's work histories often show many interruptions, which frequently reflect the double burden of responsibility borne by women in caring for families. Furthermore, there remain persistent discrepancies between the remuneration of male and female workers. In most industrialized countries, women's earnings never exceed 75 per cent of their male counterparts' and are often as low as 50 per cent, with much of the discrepancy resulting from the employment opportunities generally open to women as a result of occupational segregation.

Women are also disadvantaged in relation to private or complementary pension schemes. The Director-General's Report enumerates a number of reasons and I quote, "such as the exclusion of part-time workers, differences in protection which are unfavourable to staff in junior positions, rules restricting coverage and the vesting of benefits to employees with a substantial period of service, and unfavourable provisions for early leavers". In consequence, the lack of access to pension schemes or the unavailability of portable pensions, combined with the need to cope with frequent interruptions in their employment patterns, leave women seriously disadvantaged where coverage by private or complementary pension schemes is concerned. As a result, in many countries women are forced to rely most heavily on public sector pensions.

In developing countries, as the Director-General points out, coverage by social security schemes is in general available only in the urban formal sector of the economy. As this is frequently a minor part of the economy, and the majority of women in developing countries work in the informal sector, the proportion of women covered by statutory social security schemes is even lower in developing countries than that of men. In many countries, the total social security coverage barely exceeds 10 per cent of the population, and the informal sector is not covered at all.

It is therefore essential to pay greater attention to ways of ensuring social protection for the whole population. We commend the Director-General's conclusion that social protection flourishes best in societies which possess reasonable levels of democracy, respect human rights and human dignity, promote an equitable distribution of both income and wealth, and which give individuals the scope and the opportunity to develop fully. Such desirable standards for social protection also inevitably raise the problem of balancing the needs for social protection with the necessity of paying for it.

As the majority of the world's poor and disadvantaged are women, we believe the ability to contain social protection costs will depend largely on solving the problem of poverty among women. This means greater efforts must be made to extend basic education and training, as well as retraining for women re-entering the market. Schemes to ensure the extension of credit and other employment-producing mechanisms should also be priorities, and should focus on women regardless of their age.

Overall, we welcome the departure from traditional positions regarding the pre-eminence of the informal economy. It is clear that meeting the need for full employment will necessitate greater attention to the growing informal sector, where women are so heavily represented. We therefore regret that the resolution on the informal sector did not gain sufficient voting strength in the Resolutions Committee. With regard to these remaining resolutions, we hope that gender issues will be reflected more explicitly than at present.

Looking to the future, the Director-General refers to smaller scale, less formal systems of social security, but warns that considerable imagination will be required, and this is as likely to come from those affected (that is the men and women needing social protection) as it is from outside experts. As members of non-governmental organizations, we firmly endorse the Director-General's suggestion that governments should seek out and support a wide range of non-governmental organizations, friendly societies, co-operatives and other groups based on local communities. We strongly encourage such a development, which is in keeping with the policies we advocated at the 78th Session, namely of building on what already exists in the informal sector, and encouraging linkages with the structures and institutions in the modern sector as a means of supporting "bottom up" rather than "top down" development.

Despite our wholehearted support for such initiatives, we also realize that the main responsibility for establishing a suitable framework to provide basic guarantees of social insurance and social protection of necessity rests with governments.

The ILO is well placed to support such innovative developments and to encourage replication. In this context, it must be emphasized that the resources made available by the ILO should always be monitored to ensure that gender issues are reflected in all its programmes. We hope therefore that the ILO Social Security Department will continue the work already begun on women and social security as an equality issue.

In conclusion, we wish to stress that the debate about social insurance and social protection remains as relevant and as critical to women as it does to men. The neglect of women's needs, particularly evident in the Director-General's otherwise excellent Report shows how important it is that women themselves take part in the debate. It is equally important that all members of the tripartite system take full account of the needs of both men and women.

Qorum 266

Twenty-first sitting

Wednesday, 16 June 1993, 3.15 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Abdel Hak, Mr. Tabani and Mr. Badey

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR. ION ILIESCU, PRESIDENT OF ROMANIA

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – President of Romania, allow me to welcome you to this session of the International Labour Conference. I welcome you, on behalf of the Officers of the Conference, and on behalf of the Secretary-General, Mr. Hansenne, who was unable to greet you personally because he is attending the Human Rights Conference in Vienna.

On my own behalf and on behalf of the delegates to the International Labour Conference, I welcome you as well as what your country, Romania, represents, the values of democracy and human rights.

Mr. President, you have a long history as a defender of liberty, as exemplified by your work, at an early age, in youth organizations, fighting for democracy, and your work in the areas of science and technology, evidence of your interest in the progress and advancement of Romania.

Your election in 1990 and your re-election in 1992 represent a mandate for you to work towards economic and political liberty – your longstanding objectives.

I know that all the delegations to this Conference are looking forward to your speech.

Original French: Mr. ILIESCU (President of Romania) – It is a special pleasure for me to address this important session of the International Labour Conference on the eve of next year's double anniversary, that is 75 years of the Organization's existence and 50 years since the Declaration of Philadelphia. Both bear witness to the impressive performance of the International Labour Organization. I am thinking especially about the more than 170 Conventions and Recommendations and the extensive networks of advisory services and technical cooperation services established within the framework of the ILO. It is remarkable how the Organization has involved itself in the economic and social development of the member countries, especially the developing countries and those in the process of transition.

As regards Romania, as experience has shown in the three-and-a-half years that have elapsed since the December 1989 revolution, the reform process has proved to be much more complex than we imagined and in any event more difficult than it first seemed. It has made us aware of the manifold dimensions of the transition and has often prompted us to undertake reappraisal.

Thus we have carried out the social dimension of reform, which has proved to have very special importance. Indeed, it may determine the very success of the transition towards a market economy in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. Consequently, the fact that this year the International Labour Conference is dealing with a related theme, namely Social insurance and social protection, holds a special significance for us.

While going through the process of transition, Romania has managed to create the institutions and basic structures of a law-based State. By means of national referendum, we have adopted a modern Constitution which guarantees political pluralism, private property and fundamental human rights, including those of persons belonging to national minorities. Political freedom is guaranteed in Romania, as is borne out by the existence of many parties and the possibility of freely expressing one's opinions.

From the earliest months of 1990, free trade unions emerged in Romania. I was pleased recently to note a remark in one of the ILO publications – the World Labour Report – that the Romanian trade unions cooperate between themselves better than in other countries. Moreover, this is attested to by the recent amalgamation of several trade union federations in Romania. The newly created trade union confederation – the Fratia – that is Fraternity, the National Free Trade Union Confederation, is one of the largest trade union organizations in Central and Eastern Europe. Perhaps I should not mention this appreciation of the new confederation here when representatives of other trade union confederations are present.

The dialogue between trade unions, government and employers, has been well established. Tripartism is beginning to function, albeit with flaws and shortcomings. One result, for example, is that Romania was the first country of Central and Eastern Europe in which a collective agreement was finalized at the national level. With the support of the International Labour Organization and the World Bank, the National Council for Vocational Training is about to be set up. This will play a paramount role in the functioning of tripartism and, more generally, in improving the structures of labour organization.

These are just a few of our achievements and concerns which clearly indicate that even if we are only at the beginning our choice in favour of democracy and a market economy is irreversible and Romania's true objective is integration into modern Europe.

Social protection is inextricably linked to economic performance and to the political will of society to allocate part of its resources to the task of ensuring acceptable living conditions for the population.

Romania's economy, like those of other countries in Central and Eastern Europe, is in a state of recession. Industrial production has dropped to almost half that of 1989. Inflation, although it has not yet taken on the dimensions of hyper-inflation, has none the less reached a disturbing rate. We have a very large number of unemployed, representing 9.5 per cent of the country's active population.

The difficulties inherent in transition and economic restructuring are compounded by other difficulties stemming from external factors. In particular, traditional markets in neighbouring countries are disappearing or their capacity is decreasing and there are the consequences of the embargo on Iraq and Yugoslavia. Whole enterprises have had to be closed down, with serious economic and social consequences.

Hence the Government has had all the more reason to make social protection one of its priorities, especially by means of a flexible system of social insurance, including pensions and the reform of social assistance and protection of the population's income against inflation. At the same time, an attempt is being made to involve the whole of society in social protection activities: governmental and non-governmental organizations, social organizations, religious societies and charities, as well as individuals.

Through dialogue with the trade unions, measures have been agreed to minimize the adverse effects of price liberalization: the granting of compensation and wage indexing, the establishment of a guaranteed minimum wage throughout the economy, the extension of time-limits on unemployment benefit payments, as well as other measures.

An extremely important means of social protection is the retraining and upgrading of workers according to the current requirements of the economy, taking into account the manner in which individual themselves perceive the process of occupational achievements. In this, we think we can count on the experience, advice and support of the International Labour Organization.

The experience of transition has shown that the best means of social protection is increasing production and, in general, improving economic performance. In other words, the idea is to diversify the possibilities of effecting social protection. However well and fairly they are apportioned, modest public assets cannot satisfy the demands of a decent standard of living.

Following progress along the path of reform, we have every confidence that in the near future the signs of a halt of the decline and an upswing in industrial production will appear. Our hopes are linked to progress in privatization and to the new boost which we would like to impart to this process. These hopes are also linked to the adoption of legislation conducive to stimulating foreign investment and to diversifying the specific institutional framework of a market economy.

The process of structural change which Romania is undergoing today enhances the possibilities for cooperation between our country and the International Labour Organization, as well as the importance of this cooperation in our endeavours to modernize our economic and political structures as well as our structures for social protection.

In the new phase of relations between Romania and the International Labour Organization, our country has already ratified a large number of international labour Conventions. We have benefited from the advisory services and from technical assistance provided swiftly and professionally by experts from the International Labour Office. We are grateful for this to the Office, to its Governing Body, as well as to all those who in one way or another have made their own contribution to helping Romania.

I assure them that in its turn, the Organization can count on an active and constructive contribution from Romania in its activities and in bolstering its specific role at the heart of the international community.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – Your speech before this "international parliament" is the best proof of the values which you represent and of the efforts deployed by you to rebuild Romania. I quite agree with you when you reaffirm the need to devote considerable attention to social protection and to social problems during this transitional period in order to lessen its adverse effects. This is what the Secretary-General of the Conference requested in his report on Social insurance and social protection. We quite agree with you when you say that it is necessary to institute dialogue with the social partners to make this transition a success. You are right in saying that it is necessary to have a State based on the rule of law because that is the best guarantee for human rights and political freedoms.

Last but not least, I wish you full success in your transition efforts.

(Mr. Tabani takes the Chair.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original French: Mr. NIMAGA (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Social Security and Vocational Training, Central African Republic) – My country, the Central African Republic, has granted me the honour of representing it at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference in Geneva in my capacity as Minister of the Public Service and Labour. In the name of my Government, and on behalf of the delegation which accompanies me and on my own behalf, I should like to add my voice to the distinguished speakers who preceded me at this distinguished assembly in congratulating the President on his election to chair the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference which is taking place in this magnificent Palace of the United Nations in Geneva.

You will understand that it is often difficult to speak before such eminent delegates, especially following the brilliant address we have just heard, but I will try to let the voice of the Central African Republic be heard here.

I also congratulate the Vice-Chairmen and the other officers who were also elected and constantly assist the President in his difficult task. I am convinced that his qualities as a statesman, his ability and vision, will contribute to the success of our work.

I should also like to take this opportunity on behalf of the Central African Republic to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the ILO. I am convinced that his new term will enable him to carry out the programmes which he has already initiated for the next biennium.

My Government welcomes the Director-General's choice of topic for this year, namely Social insurance and social protection. It is a subject surely whose importance and relevance will be clear to everyone.

It becomes clear from any analysis of this topic that no country can claim to have entirely solved all the complex problems related to social protection.

It goes without saying that the implications of this vary from one continent to the other, from one State to another, and entail different degrees of difficulty. For instance, over and above certain developments which we have observed, we must recognize that external and internal factors have combined to produce adverse effects, particularly in developing countries. Therefore, there is an urgent need to set up formulas to regulate social protection.

And yet we realize that, while social protection is a major concern to any State and the objective for the year 2000, of giving every individual access to proper health care, is a priority, economic resources are becoming scarcer and more difficult to obtain and the political environment is deteriorating from one day to the next.

I should like to remind you that the Central African Republic, like other countries in the region, has instituted a social security code and has set up the Central African Office for Social Security following its independence. This organization has ambitious objectives which it is trying to achieve as far as possible. Its major long-term concern is to expand the coverage to the rural and informal sectors. To that end, studies must be carried out in this field.

At present, the Central African Social Security Fund covers the following areas: family benefits; industrial accident and occupational disease benefits; invalidity and death benefits; maternity benefits; old-age benefits; and a pension system.

As for health care, I would like to mention that in the formal sector there is no problem because 80 per cent of illness-related costs are borne by enterprises themselves.

At the institutional level, the Government has just adopted a text recognizing public offices including the Central African Social Security Office. A new development is that from now on workers and employers will have an important role to play in the development, promotion and management of this fund and this is a good example of the tripartite partnership advocated by the ILO.

We have just established, at the initiative of that fund, an orthopaedic and artificial limb centre at regional level to assist people who have suffered amputations following occupational accidents.

New measures are also being discussed to extend the coverage of the Central African Social Security Fund to the majority of our population. However, given the crisis which our country is going through at present, we note with regret that those resources which should have given greater impetus to these activities are becoming increasingly scarce, thus preventing the process from advancing further. This situation affects the financial resources of the fund like a gangrene, and is the result of the policy of recession and restructuring and the social costs of structural adjustment, whose social effects were not taken into account at the outset.

We notice, for instance, a considerable decline in contributions and this results in many cases of economic redundancy affecting most companies. Such were the origins of the Central African Social Security Fund.

As for the ratification of ILO standards, the Central African Republic is aware that a number of instruments have not yet been ratified. However, the Government undertakes to introduce these instruments as soon as Parliament is convened following legislative elections.

At the same time, in a desire to improve the living and working conditions of our workers, the Labour Code of the Central African Republic, which was drafted following our independence, is being revised to adapt it to present-day realities.

This is why the Government of my country has high expectations that the technical assistance provided by the ILO will lead to progress in the work now under way. We also believe that a revision of the Labour Code will serve as a framework for new measures to improve the performance of the Central African Labour Administration.

My country welcomes the efforts made by the Organization in the various areas of its competence and urges it to move ahead in order to promote workers' interests in a spirit of dignity, unity, self-respect, and love one's neighbour and one's country.

These conditions appear to me to be crucial for better personal and national development in a country which yearns for real democracy, because there is no social dimension without politics, and no political dimension without a sense of identity and of aspiration in each nation in accordance with its own character and its own rhythm.

I should also mention the enormous difficulties which my Government is encountering now, many of which come within the ILO's frame of reference. This is why we appeal for assistance from the ILO particularly in the areas of training, specialist managerial staff in the fields of social security, occupational health and workers' education.

I would like to see the multi-disciplinary teams become operational as soon as possible to assist us in implementing measures now under way.

May I also express the hope that the reforms which the ILO had begun in the social field will increase the efficiency of its activities, to promote social protection which is balanced and accessible to all.

To sum up, the Central African Republic has begun a social protection process with the aim of protecting all the workers in the modern, informal and rural sectors. The Central African Republic hopes that one day we will be in a position to tell this august assembly that its social security system offers the benefits so long awaited by the workers. But I will not pretend that it is anything but a very arduous task.

I also must say that the cost of public administration is enormous. To be able to make the best possible use of our meagre national resources, my Government has begun a process of rationalization, the aim of which is to reduce costs and stimulate productivity and efficiency in the public sector. For instance, we have a programme of early voluntary retirement to help our civil servants convert to work in other sectors of the economy.

This programme goes hand in hand with another programme, the aim of which is to provide training and retraining for those who have applied to take early retirement and to prepare them to work in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Finally, I should like to mention here that the process of democratization which my country has begun requires considerable sacrifice, and help will be needed from all our friends, especially the ILO, if the true democracy needed for development in the Central African Republic is to become a reality. And here I reiterate the hope that the cooperation of the ILO in its areas of competence may be effective in the Central African Republic, because social protection can only exist where there is peace, consensus and dialogue.

Mrs. WILLIAMS (Employers' delegate, Belize) – It is a great honour for me to be afforded the privilege of addressing this august body on behalf of the employers of Belize, of myself and of the delegation from Belize. I would like to add my congratulations to those already expressed to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and whish them every success in their deliberations. Congratulations are also due to the Director-General of the International Labour Office on his re-election and his timely Report. The themes Social insurance and social protection and The role of the ILO in technical cooperation are most appropriate, considering the ever-changing economic conditions worldwide which have adversely affected many countries, particularly developing countries.

Before addressing myself to the Director-General's Report, permit me once again to express my sincere thanks and gratitude to the International Labour Organization, its Regional Office and also the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre for their continued assistance to Belize, particularly in the area of advice and training.

The Belize Social Security Scheme came into existence some 12 years ago following a request made to the International Labour Organization by the Government of Belize asking for assistance in establishing the scheme. In considering the recommendations that were made, our Government decided that the scheme should be founded on social insurance principles, with an underlying approach based on risk sharing. From its inception, the Social Security Act, Chapter 34 of the Laws of Belize, 1980, established a system of social security providing pecuniary payments in the event of maternity, injury, sickness, disablement and death. Survivors' benefits and funeral grants were provided to insured persons and a social security fund was established to provide for matters related to the smooth running of the scheme.

The Social Security Scheme was reviewed by an actuary in 1986 and 1990. As a result of this review it was recommended that benefits be increased. As of 24 July 1991, the following came into effect: sickness and maternity benefits increased from 60 per cent to 80 per cent of the weekly insurable earnings; sickness benefits were extended from a maximum of 78 days to 156 days; sickness benefits were made available to contributors from the age of 14 instead of 16; injury benefits increased from 60 per cent to 80 per cent of the weekly insurable earnings; workers with 50 contributions began to qualify for sickness benefit upon making contributions for five out of 13 weeks prior to illness instead of eight out of 13 weeks. Payment of travelling costs to and from places abroad for medical treatment due to an occupational injury was increased to $1,000.

New benefits were also provided as follows:

1. The funds provided for medical care to the Ministry of Health were substantially increased from $50,000 to $1,000,000 per annum.

2. There was an increase in grants as follows: maternity grant was raised from $50,00 to $100,00 per child; funeral grant was raised from $300,00 to $950,00; retirement, survivors and invalidity grants were raised from $100,00 to a minimum of $400,00; disablement grant from less than 20 per cent to less than 25 per cent disability; the minimum retirement pension was increased from $15,00 to 25,00 per week.

As can be seen from the above, the mission of the Belize Social Security Scheme, which is to protect against economic insecurity, continues.

I am pleased to inform this body that the following have been adopted and thus incorporated into our legislation, with full cooperation of the employers' organization of Belize:

1. Minimum wages are to be established for shop assistants and domestic helpers with effect from 1 March 1993: shop assistants, employed full time or part time, in any premises where liquor is sold and consumed are entitled to $2,25 per hour; shop assistants, employed, full time or part time, in establishments other than premises where liquor is sold and consumed are entitled to $1,75 per hour.

2. The minimum rates do not apply to bona fide students who may be employed outside of school hours or during school holidays in premises covered by the Shops Act.

3. Domestic helpers, employed full time or part-time in private households are entitled to $1,75 per hour and those employed full time or part time in boarding houses, guest houses, hotels, institutions and establishments are entitled to $2,25 per hour.

Before concluding, I am delighted to mention two very important events which took place at the regional level: the ILO Regional Adviser, Mr. James Williams, visited Belize and held informative discussions with the employers' organizations; and an employers' delegate attended the sixth ILO round table for Caribbean employers' organizations in Antigua in April.

These meetings focused for the most part on: a report on ILO activities for Caribbean employers since 1990; the role of Caribbean employers' organizations in small enterprise development and in productivity improvement; and future ILO projects for Caribbean employers and employers' organizations.

May I in closing wish this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference every success in its deliberations.

Mrs. OHRSVIK (representative of the Nordic Council) – As the representative of the Nordic Council, which is the parliamentary body of cooperation between the Parliaments and the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, as well as the autonomous territories of Greenland and the Faroe and Aaland Islands, I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his excellent Report.

The Report demonstrates clearly that current international developments and the situation in member States have not diminished the role or the tasks of the ILO. The world economy as a whole still suffers from a slowdown. The upswing in the US economy appears not to be as strong as had been expected. The European Community faces serious difficulties in sustaining economic growth and generating sufficient employment in the region. The Central and Eastern European countries have encountered severe problems in making the transition from state controlled economies to market economies. The economic situation for so-called developing countries has even worsened. Most of them are trapped in a vicious cycle of stagnation, recession, inflation, unemployment and poverty.

We are very pleased to read about the work of the ILO that is aimed at improving the effectiveness of systems of social security and social protection. We agree that the first prerequisite for any development is the willingness of a community to contribute to the care of its members who are disadvantaged or need support. Social consensus needs to be fostered and reinforced by the normative policies of national constituents and by the international community, especially by the ILO with its emphasis on tripartism, human rights and social equity.

We highly value the initiative to encourage compliance by governments, employers and workers with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. However, these efforts should be better coordinated with the work of other international and regional organizations, such as the European Community.

We also have followed with interest the work to promote equality in employment. For us it is of particular interest to examine policy options, strategies and practical measures for the further promotion of equality. Therefore we look forward to what will come out of the International Forum on Equality for Women in Employment in a Changing World, which will be held under the auspices of the International Institute for Labour Studies in 1994.

We are very pleased to read about efforts to promote awareness in member States regarding the problem of child labour as well as the proposed measures to eliminate child labour and guarantee the protection of child workers. This should be followed up by more seminars, technical cooperation activities and mass media campaigns, such as the one that was launched in connection with the publication of the World Labour Report in 1992.

The Nordic Council consists of 87 members of the Nordic parliaments, elected by the parliaments in proportion to the strength of the party groups. The Council holds two sessions each year, in March and November.

There is a long tradition of Nordic cooperation in labour market policy. The cooperation started primarily in connection with the founding of the ILO. The Nordic countries felt the need to coordinate their labour market policy in connection with international cooperation and even more importantly to exchange experiences as regards their national policies.

A decisive development in the cooperation was the adoption of the Agreement on a Common Nordic Labour Market in 1954, most recently amended in 1982. According to this Agreement nationals of the Nordic countries may freely seek and take up employment in the other Nordic countries.

The Nordic countries have for a long time had close cooperation in the field of social policy. This resulted in 1955 in an agreement – the Social Security Convention – according to which nationals of one Nordic country staying in another Nordic country have, for all intents and purposes, the same social rights as the citizens of the respective country.

The current cooperation programme in the working environment field is based on the Nordic Working Environment Convention from 1989. The overriding goal of the Convention is to promote, on a Nordic basis, progress towards better working environments in all the Nordic countries. Recently, the Nordic Council recommended an extension of this Convention to include the right to skills and qualification training as well as workers' participation.

To some extent, the Nordic Social Security Convention will be replaced by the rules in the agreement on a European Economic Area between the EC and EFTA countries. The matters covered by the EEA agreement include rules and rights in the social security field for employees who move to another EEA country. Therefore, the existing Nordic Convention has been revised to reflect the new situation. The new Convention, which will come into force later this year, contains rules affecting Nordic nationals and citizens of non-EEA countries who are not covered by EEA rules, as well as rules to supplement those of the EEA agreement.

The basic principle of the EEA agreement is that the EFTA countries will apply the rules of the European Community concerning social security for people working in another country. The biggest change will affect pensions. The existing Nordic Convention provides that basic pensions should be paid by the country of residence, in accordance with the regulations of that country. Under the EC rules, which will supersede the Nordic Convention on this point, pensions are to be paid by all the countries in which the individual has worked, on the basis of salary and period of employment, irrespective of the person's country of residence upon retirement.

In November 1992 the Nordic Council adopted a recommendation concerning the Nordic model on the proposal of the Social Committee. According to this proposal, the Council recommends the Nordic Council of Ministers and the governments of Nordic countries seek to safeguard Nordic interests in the fields of the labour market and labour law, both in the framework of the EEA agreement and, where relevant, in the event individual Nordic countries become members of the EC.

The main theme of the session of the Nordic Council in March 1993 was unemployment and its consequences. Unemployment is rising rapidly in the Nordic countries. Attention was specially drawn to the growing numbers of young people out of work and to the serious consequences this is having for both young people themselves and society as a whole. The growth of racism was also one of the issues discussed at the session.

The Social Committee has called on the governments of the Nordic countries to be involved actively in strengthening the activities of the UN Economic Commission for Europe, especially in the social sector. The Committee considers it important to find all-European solutions to problems relating to social and health policies, the labour market, refugees and immigration, and development in Eastern and Central Europe.

In conclusion, I wish to express my gratitude for this opportunity both to present some Nordic views on a few of the items before the Conference and to give some information about the work in the Nordic Council. I wish the ILO continued success in its important work.

Original French: Mr. LOUA (Minister of Administrative Reform, Public Service and Labour, Guinea) – May I start by offering the President and Vice-Presidents my delegation's warm and sincere congratulations on their brilliant election. I am certain that under their wise and experienced guidance our session will be crowned with success.

May I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election for a new term of office, which should enable the ILO to implement more fully the major reforms in structure and in working methods and procedures that it has initiated for the greater benefit of its constituents.

I would also like to express the gratitude of my delegation to the Director-General and staff of the ILO for the preparation of comprehensive documents and reports containing a wealth of information that will certainly provide material for constructive debate.

My delegation has noted with great interest the key themes of the different documents especially those dealt with in the first part of the Report of the Director-General entitled Social insurance and social protection.

My country, the Republic of Guinea, has an interesting experience to report in this field. On the basis of a family allowances compensation fund set up in 1956, the Independent State of Guinea set up a national social security fund, the CNSS, in 1960 to be responsible for providing workers in the modern sectors with benefits under a general social insurance scheme covering family allowances, industrial accidents and occupational illnesses, disability and old age. Employers' contributions constituted the only regular financial resources of the CNSS, which was administered by the State. For a number of reasons and because of the economic situation, the State soon integrated the revenue of the CNSS in the general public accounts, allocating to the institution specific sums from the budget to cover its various technical and operating expenses. This practice, which lasted throughout the period of state management of the economy, that is from 1963 to 1984, entrusted to the CNSS the role of a financial service responsible for the management of a minimum social insurance scheme throughout the country and for implementation of the international Conventions of the ILO that had been ratified by the Government.

At the end of this period, in 1985, the CNSS was declared a public administrative and social body with civil States and financial autonomy. Its management was entrusted to a tripartite board of directors on which the State, employers and workers were equally represented.

This initiative by the Government of the Second Republic laid the basis for a far-reaching reform of structures, of working methods and procedures and of the basic rules governing the system. Thanks to wide-ranging assistance from the United Nations system in general and the ILO and the UNDP in particular, encouraging results were achieved in staff training and the rigorous management of resources. This led to the formulation of ambitious projects for a more substantial contribution to the improvement of working and living conditions, maternity protection and protection of the health of workers and their families. In addition, ways and means of extending the present general social security scheme to other categories of workers and to the many victims of structural adjustment measures were studied. These projects show that my country will certainly continue to request the ILO's valuable technical cooperation in order to improve the policies and functioning of the social protection scheme, which is designed to serve as an effective tool for economic progress and social justice.

My delegation therefore welcomes the debate on technical cooperation set in motion by the ILO. It already endorses the conclusions of that debate. My delegation further hopes that technical cooperation will be provided on the basis of our countries' development needs and priorities and that it takes into account the need to use and develop national capabilities and resources in such a way as to further self-sufficiency and sustainable development. In this context, the adoption by the ILO of a policy of active partnership and the creation of multidisciplinary teams in the field constitute a constructive approach which can count on my country's approval and support.

With regard to the technical items on the agenda of our session, my delegation shares the concern to prepare legal and practical instruments for the prevention of major industrial accidents, which have unfortunately already claimed numerous victims and seriously damaged the environment in different parts of the world. The lives of men and women and the natural environment deserve to be protected from such hazards.

As for part-time employment, which is a little-known phenomenon in the developing countries, the experience of the industrialized countries shows that it may be a way of providing employment for a large workforce. During these times of acute economic crises and persistent unemployment, it is certainly an interesting proposition for the various parties concerned. In our opinion, however, its legal framework needs to be defined so as to protect the interests of all the parties and avoid discrimination and possible social injustice.

Having concluded this rapid overview, I should just like to say that we firmly believe that our Organization can look forward to a bright future, particularly in terms of its standard-setting activities and technical cooperation. It is to be hoped that on the eve of its 75th anniversary, our Organization will succeed in further mobilizing its richest constituents, as well as other international organizations and NGOs, so that they continue to provide effective assistance to the developing countries with a view to initiating and sustaining economic growth, which is a prerequisite for any genuine progress towards the attainment of basic human rights and the eradication of poverty. Hence the initial need for solidarity between States in order to establish and extend social protection and translate into practice the ideals set forth in the Preamble to the ILO's Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

(Mr. Badey takes the Chair.)

Original Portuguese: Mr. TIAGO GOMES (Employers' delegate, Angola) – May I ask the President to accept my heartfelt congratulations on his election to the highest office of the International Labour Conference and my sincere wishes for his full success in discharging his mission.

His undertaking promises to be a complex one, because tasks have accumulated and decisions have been deferred which, if carried out and taken at the proper time, would have long ago led to a change in the action of this international institution in the social sphere and enabled it to be active and adapted to the economic, social and political changes which have occurred in the world over the last decade. The establishment of a new social and economic world order remains an objective for the developing countries.

In Angola, after a short-lived period of peace, the guns have once again plunged the country into an unprecedented and all-embracing crisis, virtually wiping out the hopes of a people whose stamina and resolve are dwindling by the day. Its very survival is now at stake. Today, the most important goal is to resolve the national questions and the ILO must not be indifferent to either the destiny or the sufferings of an entire people.

I appeal to this international organization of which Angola is a Member to redouble its efforts, and we give our pledge in this respect, for the establishment of genuine and lasting peace, humanitarian assistance and the harmonious development of the country. Since war is a threat to international peace, let us not waste time in seeking to identify the culprits in this calamity. There is no point in ascribing responsibility; we need to resolve the question of war and guarantee peace and tranquillity for our population.

A year ago, I was very optimistic when I spoke from this podium. Angola was enjoying peace. Now, notwithstanding the profound change in the circumstances which have led this country once again to a fratricidal war, the ILO must extend immediate, meaningful, balanced and sustained support to Angola and provide materials, equipment and practicable sustainable programmes to strengthen the potential of our embryonic movement of National Employers' Associations, in the social and economic fields, and help satisfy our permanent vocational training requirements. We must provide new jobs for demobilized soldiers and war refugees and social and occupational rehabilitation for war invalids and other handicapped citizens and improve business management in the country.

The spectre of war is the immediate cause of the decline in moral values and the slump in output in various sectors of economic activity. But this should not be a pretext for justifying the abuse of power, and for hampering the initiatives of citizens, stripping them of their dignity and violating their basic rights.

Here I would like to reaffirm the concerns expressed last year by emphasizing the need to establish a new and fairer world social and economic order which is conducive to the harmonious development of countries, and to call for the strengthening of south-south cooperation and the establishment of Portuguese as an official language of the ILO. There is no need to repeat the arguments in favour of these goals, the partial or full attainment of which to a large extent will depend upon your pragmatism.

It is also important to stress the need to extend and build upon the study of the effectiveness, urbi et orbi of standard-setting texts established by the ILO. It is not just a question of querying the interpretation of such texts, but reflecting on their effectiveness and applicability within the various legal frameworks of the Members of the Organization, which enjoy varying levels of social and economic development and different standards of living. What is at stake is the fulfilment of the ILO's main objective, the establishment of social justice throughout the world. A collective logic should not overshadow the logic of the Organization.

It is essential to draw a distinction between international labour Conventions of a social nature and basic human rights. The ILO must insist that member States ratify Conventions concerning freedom of association, tripartism, individual initiative, minimum age for work, the elimination of forced labour and non-discrimination. These are the fundamental corollaries of the ILO's raison d'être and of the social justice which it proclaims.

I would like to join others in hailing the re-election of Mr. Michel Hansenne for a new term as Director-General of the ILO. His pragmatic work in his previous term of office has further enhanced our admiration and the confidence we have in his stewardship of the ILO. His election betokens a resolve to take up challenges through unswerving continuity and I hope that the future work of the Director-General will also be guided by a spirit of renewal, of transforming the status quo and adapting the functions and objectives of the ILO to the social, political and economic changes which we are witnessing in the world today.

To conclude, I would like to express here the need for Angola to be classed amongst the countries which make up the southern region of Africa. Indeed, Angola lies in the southern part of the African continent, its official language is Portuguese, and it has linguistic, cultural and economic affinities with clearly identified countries in that region. It is unacceptable and illogical, as well as very costly, for us to be included amongst the French-speaking countries of Central Africa, within the structural organization of the ILO. Such a policy pays scant regard to the individuality of Angola.

Original Spanish: Mr. JIMENEZ AGUILAR (Employers' adviser, Spain) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents for their election and the excellent way in which they have been carrying out their responsibilities.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his recent re-election as head of the International Labour Office, with a key mandate for the future of our Organization.

As you know, our group, through the International Organization of Employers, has recently proposed to the governments and to the workers to undertake a serious debate to help the ILO to face the challenges of the contemporary world and once again to assume its rightful place in the United Nations system, as the pre-eminent agency in the social field.

The deep crisis of the centralized economies is giving way to a growing recognition of the role that private initiative and private enterprise play in the economic and social field.

Along these lines the ILO should promote the establishment of an atmosphere of freedom and flexibility which will favour private initiative, a market economy based upon the autonomy of the parties and decisive policy of human resources development.

This new orientation and this new message, which other United Nations agencies have already adopted, should characterize the standard-setting and technical cooperation activities of the ILO, as it pursues the fundamental objective of productive employment – the basis of social justice.

The Director-General was very wise in devoting his Report to social security, a fundamental element of social policy; it constitutes an essential factor in the social progress of nations, and its development depends on viability and stability.

Therefore, social security schemes must be based upon realistic criteria suited to the economic situation of each country.

We must not lose sight of the fact that, although social security is an agent of progress, its financing is based mainly upon the contributions of the employers and workers, and thus has a direct bearing on labour costs, and an indirect impact on employment.

Consequently, we must closely and carefully monitor the criteria for increases in social protection expenditure, for if they are not consistent with the real economic possibilities of each country, they may have the perverse effect of penalizing employment and prove economically unviable.

The Spanish experience with social protection has been followed with great interest by the employers' organizations, especially since social protection expenditures in the last ten years have increased, on average, by 5 per cent of GDP, while the GDP itself over the same period has increased on average by only 2.6 per cent.

Therefore, the additional tax burden for employers and workers to maintain the level of social protection has been quite heavy, amounting at the end of the 1980s to a contribution of 13.95 per cent of the GNP.

This expansive policy is the result of demographic factors, of wage increases, of the increase in the number of beneficiaries, and of the universality of health care and social services, which are still financed primarily by contributions, and to a lesser extent by general tax revenue.

As recognized by the Report of the Director-General, and as in other countries, the increase in social costs up to the year 1990 could be covered thanks to the economic growth of the last five years of the 1980s – that is the period 1985-90 – the ensuing job creation and some of the measures taken in order to rationalize the management and financing of the social security systems.

During the last few years, however, the situation has radically changed. In our country there has been a sharp drop in the active population, along with a serious loss of employment; the rate of unemployment now stands at between 17 and 20 per cent.

Also, wage and non-wage labour costs are rising faster than the average of our neighbouring countries, thus making Spanish enterprises less competitive.

Some of the measures for the collection of social security contributions have contributed to this increase in labour costs, and have tended to maintain fairly substantial percentage differences between our social security financing and that of other countries with whom we compete in the European single market.

In spite of this, the Spanish Government maintains its policy of increasing social expenditure at rates exceeding economic growth forecasts because of agreements with trade unions which call for a re-evaluation of pensions and other benefits which, moreover, alter the necessary balance between social protection expenditures and the contributions of each individual.

Thus, the capacity to generate private savings is replaced by a collective system of social protection based on the principle of solidarity between generations, to the dissatisfaction of all, including the workers, since it is unlikely that future pensions will have a purchasing power equivalent to the present contributions.

As stated in the Director-General's Report, the employers' organizations feel that perhaps this system has a disincentive effect on labour as a consequence of substituting a homogenous and compulsory system for individual initiative.

The Spanish model, which is enshrined in the Constitution, consists of three levels: basic, occupational and complementary (free and individual). Unfortunately, the third level is underdeveloped and has not lived up to the original expectations owing to many restrictions, fiscal limitations and administrative intervention. If we wish to guarantee a stable future for the social security system in our country, changes are needed, particularly as regards the management of the system, which needs to be strengthened through cooperation with private enterprise.

It is not sufficient to require enterprises to make up shortfalls in some benefits, as recently has been the case of the sickness benefit. Enterprises should be able to cooperate in the management of cash benefits, to ensure that the present lack of control and coordination by the public authorities does not lead to fraud or to greater economic costs and budgetary deficits which seriously harm the interests of employers and workers.

In the future we will have to ensure that what is socially desirable is consistent with what is economically possible by adapting needs to means, without undertaking agreements that cannot be fulfilled. We must establish priorities and maintain the principle of responsibility shared by all individuals in society.

The Spanish employers' organizations have always been open to social dialogue, which we view as the best formula for solving the problems before us.

From this rostrum I would like to make a new offer of cooperation along these lines, trusting that, through the joint efforts of the social partners, we will find the way to maintain balanced and viable social progress.

Original French: Mr. DOSSOU (Workers' delegate, Benin) – I take this opportunity, on behalf of the workers of Benin, to present our congratulations to the President on his election and to the Director-General on his re-election. We are convinced that the ILO will continue to work towards the improvement of workers' conditions of life and of industrial relations.

The theme of the present session of the International Labour Conference is timely, given the social and economic dilemma faced by countries such as mine. The depth of the analysis and the pertinent comments made in the Report of the Director-General go to the very heart of the debate on social security. It is in fact a question of either assuring or extending workers' social security coverage at a time when economic prospects are sombre.

In the case of my country, however, I must stress the degree of flippancy, of cynicism, on the part of those who have designated unsuitable staff to head the social security institutions or who have been guilty themselves of misappropriating the funds of these institutions.

Indeed, while the Benin Office of Social Security (OBSS) has a deficit of close to CFA3 billion francs, the State owes it more than CFA12 billion francs because of non-payment of contributions (owed by State societies) or for money which has been taken from the funds or for assets frozen in bankrupt companies.

The workers are the ones who bear the costs of this bad management since their old-age pensions are paid late or the State has difficulty in paying the full benefits. At present the situation is a matter of serious concern despite certain efforts to improve it. It affects particularly the workers laid off under the structural adjustment programmes, who received compensation payments adding up to a total of CFA 2.5 billion francs, on average, and which melted like karifé butter in the sun, since when the workers have received no benefits at all.

Trade union efforts have made it possible to attenuate ill effects and now those concerned are not paid back the whole of their contributions so that their only assured benefit is an old-age pension.

On the other hand, the measures recommended in structural adjustment programmes continue to be a long-term concern for my Government. For those still active, retirement is now at age 55 or after 30 years of service, at a time when recruitment in the public services has been suspended or, in the private sector, slowed down owing to economic stagnation. For instance, when it comes to social security structures, the situation is becoming more and more serious since we are burning the candle at both ends.

Additional insurance systems which are now being proposed to the workers are not very likely to be effective since the latter's income is so low. Selling the workers castles in the air will only aggravate their situation because these insurance companies do not have the necessary experience.

Given the gravity of the social situation in Benin and the wide scale of solutions called for, the coalition of workers and employers was able to reject, under tripartite agreement, the formula of "ceilings" (in fact limitations) for pensions proposed by the Benin Social Security Office.

We seek help from the ILO and the UNDP to reduce the cynicism or the lack of humanitarian consideration of the Bretton Woods institutions, which lose sight of one of the main principles of the United Nations, that is the guarantee of peace in the world by improving social conditions.

Serious threats are also affecting social security systems for workers following the abolition of price controls and of subventions on the most essential products, and monetary devaluation, all consequent upon the setting up of structural adjustment programmes.

Despite the seriousness of the situation, it cannot be compared to that which millions of workers in Azania are going through. They are deprived of the minimum social protection and, more important, of liberty. The entire international community must continue its efforts so that all Azanian workers have the same rights as workers elsewhere.

My hopes also extend to all the workers whose lives are being shattered because of wars throughout the world.

The United Nations and its specialized agencies can reverse the present trends in social security by improving the price of agricultural products, by helping to restitute to the countries concerned the colossal amounts of money which have been stolen from them and deposited safely in the financial institutions of developed countries.

Such economic and financial measures would assure a solid basis for strengthening and expanding social security systems, particularly in the informal sector. It would be a real safety valve at a time of economic and employment crisis.

More specifically, in Benin the ILO and the UNDP could help us to strengthen the abilities of trade unions to respond to the challenge they are facing. One way would be to help them to restructure our social security institutions so that they can face a better future. They could also be helped through the technical training of trade union leaders to make them more capable of carrying out their tasks within the tripartite framework.

Original Spanish: Mr. ZAVALA COSTA (Employers' delegate, Peru) – It is an honour and with pride, as Employers' delegate of Peru, to address all the representatives of the member States at this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am happy to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their elections, and the Director-General of the ILO on his unanimous re-election for a further period of office. I also wish to extend my greetings to the new member States who have joined us.

The Report of the Director-General this year touches upon a very important subject for my country: Social insurance and social protection. This is of special significance to us because a good social security system guarantees for the workers the peace and quiet they deserve upon retirement and a decent income for their retirement. As for their health, the existence of an effective system of benefits brings significant savings and above all the guarantee that in the event of illness or accident, costly treatment can be covered without affecting the family economy. Social protection, therefore, fulfils a role which is essential and its access is a basic human right.

Unfortunately, my country has not been characterized by the efficiency and justice of benefits, particularly in the field of retirement where pensions are tiny and almost an affront to human dignity. Health care, on the other hand, has maintained an acceptable level with a good service being provided mainly because of the professional staff working in the hospitals of the Peruvian Institute of Social Security. The main problem has been the lack of premises and resources to be able to attend a greater number of insured persons. Thus our analysis here will concentrate on the subject of retirement pensions.

In this field, we are consolidating in my country a most revolutionary structural reform which the Confederation of Private Employers' Enterprises, which I represent, supports. I refer to the private pension funds which permit private capital and initiative to participate in social security, thus eliminating the State monopoly which has existed to date in this area. The law makes provision for the establishment of the so-called pension fund administrations, which are limited companies which have the sole purpose of administering pension funds and granting and administering old-age disability and survivors' pensions and other benefits established by the private scheme.

The main difference between this new private system and the State social security system is that the private scheme is based upon a system of individual capitalization in which the contributions of each worker are paid into a private account, which increases month by month, with the investment made by the pension fund producing interest. In other words, the worker contributes to his own future and for that of the members of his family, whom he elects as beneficiaries, in the event of premature death. He can also increase the level of his funds by voluntary contributions over and above the compulsory contribution of 10 per cent. Thus, a worker can guarantee that his income, when he stops working, will be comparable to or even higher than that earned during his active life. The administration must invest the funds at the highest possible interest level. The assets of the fund are independent and different from the pensions fund which it administers.

The State is not excluded however. The State scheme will continue to operate because the private system is not compulsory. Workers who so wish may remain affiliated to the Peruvian Social Security Institute.

In addition, a body has been established to supervise the pension fund administration, to ensure that they invest correctly and achieve a minimum level of returns based on the average achieved by all the bodies participating in the system. Thus no insured person will be prejudiced by the errors committed by the pension fund administrations.

The advantage of the system lies in the free competition which it provides. As we said before, social security used to be a monopoly in which contributions were compulsory. Since there was no other alternative, there was no incentive to improve benefits. Today the situation is different. There are already several such authorized administrations which compete with one another in offering what each considers the best alternatives. When the race starts, they will strive to ensure the best possible investments and returns. The winners will be the insured persons since they will be sure of a decent pension at the end of their careers. For the enterprises and the country, this system has an additional advantage. Economic analysts agree that these pension fund investments will make it possible to channel resources in the medium and long term towards productive activity which will help to restore national economic activity.

Finally, I would like to speak about another major change in my country at present. We are debating the total reform of our Political Constitution. The Constitution Commission of the Constituent Assembly has prepared a preliminary draft bill, which will be debated in the coming days, and my Confederation is convinced that it is necessary to amend the Constitution, since the text currently in force contains a number of provisions which are not appropriate to the development of the country, and which include some which generate false hopes among the people which are impossible to achieve, as well as others which are detrimental to the market economy and free initiative and which discourage the investment which the country needs. The structure of the State needs to be modified to guarantee the continuity of the democratic system and thus the establishment of the necessary legal security for investors.

We therefore believe that the main characteristics of the new Constitution should be the following: the text approved in 1979 needs to be substantially reformed to create the social conditions which will enable the members of the national community to achieve the greatest level of material and spiritual welfare; it should enshrine the basic principles of relations between society and the State, with the regulatory aspects being left to legislation. It should therefore be a reduced text, so as to make it easy to understand and disseminate and in the final analysis it should grant a paramount role to private initiative in the development of the country and consolidate the promotional role of the State, with a view to increasing the standard of living of our people, stimulating productivity and enhancing the international competitivity of our products.

As regards social security, we believe that the State should guarantee that each insured person has the right of access to whatever social system he favours, whether public, private or mixed. The concept of free choice must be introduced in the field of health and pension benefits. In the labour field, the text of the draft bill is consonant with the common and modern demand for flexibility in labour relations.

Most people have now understood that there is no point in establishing laws which may wax lyrical about protection but which in practice are not applied when there are no jobs and when enterprises are unable to bear the excessive burdens placed on them by a poorly understood concept of protection. All that this so-called protection of workers achieved over the last two decades was to swell the ranks of the unemployed and the underemployed, the result of which was the burgeoning of the informal sector which in my country accounts for more than half the man hours worked.

To halt this trend is indeed a challenge. My Confederation believes that labour regulations should contain clear, flexible and stable standards which establish the bases for an on-going policy to promote access to productive employment, improve the real incomes of workers and reduce the scope of informal work.

The Constitution must enshrine certain fundamental principles and leave their application to legislation. These rights, in a reality which is as changing as that of the world of labour, need to be adapted constantly to the current economic and social climate rather than – as has lamentably been the case to date – put a brake on development.

In conclusion, my country is currently going through a period of transformation which the employers will confront in a decisive spirit, providing initiative and confidence so that we can emerge from the crisis and underdevelopment. We need new attitudes and new action, consonant with the new social, economic and political order. In this rush of change in a changing world, as the Chairman of the Governing Body said in opening this session, the ILO, which will next year be celebrating its 75th anniversary, and whose fundamental mandate is set forth in the Preamble of its Constitution and reiterated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, must strive its utmost to find new and adequate responses to the problems confronting the world of work so that we can preserve universal and lasting peace through the effective promotion of social justice.

Mr. GATTEGNO (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Israel) – It gives me pleasure to join the other speakers in congratulating the President on his election. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents.

In Israel, labour relations between the employers' and the workers' organizations are based on a system of collective agreements signed by both parties. This system goes back many years. The collective agreements and labour laws determine working conditions such as salary, vacation pay, pension, cost of living adjustments, working arrangements, and the way in which negotiations are conducted, etc. The decent relations and good system of communication between the employers' and workers' organizations (the Histadrut) have through the years created concepts and rules for conducting negotiations while maintaining industrial peace. Indeed, during the last few years, the private sector has not suffered many strikes and very few labour disputes, despite the state of our economy and the occasional necessity, deriving from the financial difficulties of companies, to dismiss workers. The economic state of Israel and of the rest of the world has resulted in a large increase in unemployment rates, and it is highly important that all government bodies, employers and employees work vigorously to reduce unemployment. This must be the main goal of their activities in the near future.

One of the major events that occurred in recent years is the immigration of hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews to Israel. Absorbing these immigrants can contribute significantly to the advancement and stability of Israel in every respect. All the same, one of the most difficult problems is to find employment for these immigrants. Vast efforts are being made by all government bodies, the employers' organizations and the Histadrut to create vacancies for them as well as for veteran Israelis. For that purpose, large financial investments are required, and the employers' organizations have submitted projects to the encourage Israeli and foreign investors to invest in Israel by setting up new enterprises in which immigrants and Israelis will be employed. We are hopeful that new enterprises will be established and will bring about an improvement in the economy of Israel and a decrease in the rate of unemployment.

The pension schemes, and the social security system as a whole, face a critical crisis in many countries and are a central issue of discussion between the social partners. This requires a complex response of great wisdom. All parties should recognize the depth and severity of the problems, and they must share the burden of finding the financial and structural solutions deriving from their mutual responsibilities on that basic issue.

Concerning the issues on the agenda of this Conference, I would like to point out that on the issue of safety at work and the prevention of working accidents, all public bodies in Israel – the Government, the employers' and workers' organizations – are aware of the fact that everything should be done to prevent and minimize the incidence of accidents. We have very wide-ranging legislation which includes a set of rules specifying the measures which must be taken by both employer and employee in order to maintain the safety of the worker at work. These regulations often subject the employer to large expenses and make production processes costly. However, everyone involved understands that this is a price that must be paid and that the value of human life transcends any other consideration.

In regard to the issue of "part-time work", I would like to point out that in Israel, workers are usually employed on a full-time basis. Production and work processes in industrial plants are set and arranged for the hiring of workers on a full-time basis. Employees who for various reasons work part time are usually employed in small businesses. We are not of the opinion that this issue should be settled through legislation. We believe it should be left to negotiation between the employer and the employee alone, without any outside interference.

To sum up, I would like to point out the important role of the ILO in promoting labour relations while involving the government, employers and employees. This Organization will reserve and maintain its status only if it keeps up with the dramatic changes that are occurring throughout the world.

The ILO also plays an important and central part in the field of guidance and technical cooperation, mainly in developing countries and in countries where such free organizations of employers and employees do not always exist. The Office can provide these essential activities more effectively if it listens carefully and with an open ear to the real needs of these countries.

Original French: Mr. KISWE MAYA (Minister of Labour, Manpower and Social Welfare, Zaire) – In taking the floor before this assembly, I would like first of all, on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Zaire, of my delegation and myself to join with the previous speakers to present to the President of the Conference and to the Vice-Presidents our warm congratulations on their election at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

My warm congratulations also go to the Director-General not only on his re-election but also on his excellent Report on the activities of the ILO, and on his readiness to help the world of work.

All the intellectual, moral and professional qualities they possess and their rich experience in the world of labour assure us that this session of the Conference will be successful in attaining its objectives.

The excellent Report of the Director-General of the ILO, which is the basis for our discussion, deals in Part 1, Social insurance and social protection, with a topic which has all our attention and looks at the role to be played by the ILO in helping to make these schemes more efficient and effective.

However, social security has broader objectives than the prevention or alleviation of poverty. It is the response to an aspiration to security in the broadest sense of the word. Its basic objective is to guarantee to individuals and their families that their standard of living and quality of life will not be jeopardized by any social or economic development.

Certainly, most social security schemes throughout the world, particularly in countries going through structural adjustment are facing many problems, particularly poor operation, an inability to collect dues, the non-payment of social benefits and exhausted reserves.

This is why we feel that the ILO should give these member States advice and technical assistance particularly geared to the need to provide a healthy and equitable financial basis for these schemes.

In Zaire, we have established a social security scheme which covers three areas: pensions; occupational hazards; and family benefits. The national Social Security Institute now manages the scheme and will have a tripartite and rotating form of management.

Taking account of economic and social considerations, the Government of my country decided some ten years ago to reflect not only on the state of the benefits, protection and social security system but also on the future of social security and social services in Zaire.

We note that the implementation of such a reform requires considerable financial, material and human resources which my Government alone cannot provide. This is why Zaire is appealing for international cooperation and hoping for support in the form of technical cooperation programmes from the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General also mentions the achievements attained or in the process of being attained in various areas of the world. The delegation of Zaire is satisfied to note that as in the past, more than half of the technical cooperation expenditure of our Organization is being given to developing countries, particularly those in Africa.

Nevertheless, changes in the social and economic situation mean that the ILO should improve even further the content of its programmes and improve the use made of its means of action to be able to meet the many challenges now facing it.

In Zaire, as in many other developing countries, a persistent economic crisis has hit the country hard.

In a determined effort to stop economic stagnation and to end the crisis, the Government has just concluded the 27th session of the National Labour Council organized with the participation of partners such as the ILO and UNESCO within the framework of the World Decade for Cultural Development, in the course of which important protective measures were taken in consultation with the social partners. These measures deal particularly with job security, which is poor at the moment, encouraging the creation of new jobs, improving the social climate in enterprises and improving the purchasing power of our workers.

The National Labour Council has also decided to create a national fund for health and maternity insurance, and extend the system of social security to the liberal professions, in the context of updating our Labour Code and our Social Security Code.

The process of social democratization had as its corollary in my country the creation of trade unions, usually by persons without the necessary training in that field. Hence, the need to organize training seminars for leaders of occupational organizations.

The same is true for the training and retraining of labour inspectors and various persons involved in job creation, for the benefit of whom we have begun restructuring at the government level and we welcome cooperation from the ILO.

With regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents Zaire believes that we need to adopt the Convention and Recommendation proposed by the International Labour Office to reduce the risks and the effects of major accidents.

As for part-time work, we believe that this new form of employment offers the possibility of preserving old jobs and creating new ones at a time when the employment crisis is a serious threat to future social and political stability as well as the prospects for the development of our countries.

Our assembly should reflect on these questions so as to explore the possibility of improving the efficiency of part-time work and at the same time avoiding the risk of reducing full-time employment.

As for the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, the Zairian delegation believes that in a changing world, the ILO and the principles it embodies should remain a guiding light for those responsible, in our member States, for social policy.

Our Organization should take better account of the diversity of situations and needs in our respective countries and of the services required of it.

We encourage the policy of active partnership advocated by the ILO in order to bring the Organization and its member States closer together and reinforce its presence in the field.

We feel that the movement towards democratization, which is currently taking place in Africa, justifies more than ever the priority given to the promotion of tripartism within the ILO's technical cooperation programmes.

As for the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia, Zaire is convinced that continuing the negotiations under way and the support of the international community will make it possible to eradicate this odious system so that in the future the way can be cleared for a prosperous multi-racial society.

In conclusion, I should like to reaffirm the hope my country has in the positive outcome of this session and our firm belief in the ideals and principles of our Organization.

Original French: Mr. HOSSU (Workers' delegate, Romania) – On behalf of the workers of Romania, may I transmit most heartfelt congratulations to the President of this session of the International Labour Conference on his election, as well as to the Director-General of the International Labour Office on his re-election. I would like to take this opportunity to thank, as well, all those who, present or absent today and represented or not represented in this august assembly, are struggling for the ideal of social equity which is the very basis of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, struggling for this ideal to become a reality in the world in which we live.

The theme chosen by the Director-General reminds us that poverty, wherever it exists, is a danger to the prosperity of all and that war on want should be waged with unstinting energy within each nation and through continued and concerted international endeavour, recalling two of the fundamental principles of the International Labour Organization expressed in the Declaration of Philadelphia almost 50 years ago. And if the theme has the merit of recalling these principles, the content of the Report draws our attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the efforts made in this direction, most of the world's population lives without any system of social security or else with a system which is inadequate or insufficient. As always, the conclusions of the Director-General contain valuable suggestions for the future activities of the Organization.

Unfortunately, Romania is not at present among those countries in which the social security systems cover a large number of contingencies satisfactorily. The standard of living of Romania's population has dropped to a worrying level and workers now have the feeling that there is no solution able to pull the country out of its present economic crisis.

Undoubtedly, immediately after December 1989 many changes took place in Romania and Romanians today theoretically enjoy many basic human rights. Among these, the right to social protection has in recent years been the subject of several regulations of a legislative or conventional nature, and, if we confined ourselves to appraising the quality of the social security system in terms only of the sum of theoretical principles at its base then we would be compelled to acknowledge that, from this point of view, our country is a positive, albeit a still imperfect and incomplete, example. Unfortunately, although these principles may nourish our spirit, they are no longer capable today of winning our trust as far as implementation is concerned. Theoretically, the present social security system in Romania covers all the contingencies mentioned in the Director-General's Report: pensions, unemployment benefit, compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases, health care, and family allowances. But in practice the sums allocated for this goal are absurd, since the minimum wage can neither guarantee Romanian workers a decent standard of living nor in the best possible scenario do more than reach subsistence level.

In his speech, the Romanian Minister of Labour declared that legal measures had been taken for the free negotiation of salaries between employees and workers' representatives. It is very true that the national legislation proclaims freedom of negotiation but national legislation, and especially the law on wages, is always constrained by a provision which allows the Government to adopt measures to moderate wage growth for limited but undetermined periods; 1993 is already the third year in which the Government, availing itself of this legal provision, has been limiting the possibilities of free growth in wages while prices are given free reign.

We are, however, aware of the fact that structural economic reform cannot be carried out without sacrifices and we have agreed to these sacrifices. Since 1991 we have accepted a drop in the purchasing power of wages to a certain limit so that, on the one hand, profitable enterprises can be strengthened and their economic potential consolidated and, on the other hand, the Government can take the necessary measures to restructure unprofitable enterprises and create new jobs. But we note that our realistic attitude is viewed as evidence of the weakness of the trade union movement in a situation where we are still waiting for the privatization process, now at the embryonic stage, and when unprofitable enterprises continue to survive at the expense of the profitable ones, and bad or even unfair management practices in enterprises leading to the wholesale dismissal of workers are tolerated. At present, the standard of living of the population is dropping at a worrying rate, and the Government seems increasingly inclined to resort to authoritarian measures. On several occasions, following an agreement with trade union organizations, the Government has revised downwards the results of the bargaining process, using new regulations to implement agreements. This is what happened with the recent negotiations, concluded in May, mentioned by the government representative who stated that following these negotiations agreement had been reached on a minimum wage.

Notwithstanding this agreement, there are as yet no regulations in Romania guaranteeing a minimum wage for workers. In conditions where there are no safeguards for the payment of a minimum wage, it is difficult to discuss genuine social protection for disadvantaged categories of the population. One of the basic demands underlying the collective conflict started this year by the confederations constituting the National Consultative Council of Romanian trade unions, therefore concerned the minimum wage. As the existing social security system is regulated almost exclusively by statutory instruments, the agreements concluded by direct negotiations between the employers' and workers' organizations have proved to be practically inapplicable because of fiscal measures subsequently imposed by the rapid expedient of regulations. It seems almost impossible to change the system because, although in theory trade union organizations are entitled to establish their programme and means of action themselves, national legislation prohibits them from initiating collective labour conflicts, if satisfaction of their claims requires the adoption of legal regulations. Although trade union organizations, basing their actions on standards and principles established by the ILO with respect to freedom of association, have ignored the ban and initiated labour conflicts that have even included strikes, the legal authorities have in almost all cases declared such strikes illegal and the trade union organizations have been compelled to pay large sums of money in damages.

In spite of all the difficulties encountered in the process of democratization of society, Romania's workers are convinced that this process is irreversible and that the faster the country moves towards a real market economy, the faster democracy will be achieved, especially if the developed countries provide further assistance.

In this connection, the ILO's technical cooperation programmes are of great benefit. We believe that maximum effectiveness is achieved through programmes designed to consolidate employers' and workers' organizations, to create democratic systems of tripartite consultations and to set up national tripartite bodies responsible for the promotion of these instruments.

Also, as part of technical cooperation programmes, we hope that some thought will be given to the possibility of training independent national and regional experts in international labour standards, so that employers' and workers' organizations may call on their services when necessary.

In Romania, familiarity with these standards is a privilege enjoyed by a limited number of specialists employed by the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, and a few academics. The ILO would be doing Romania's workers a great favour if it could organize, in the framework of technical cooperation programmes, seminars to promote familiarity with international labour standards, to be attended by representatives of employers and workers and by judges.

I would particularly like to stress the importance of such seminars because, as I have just pointed out, many conflicts between employers and workers end up being resolved in the courts, and as many judges are not familiar with international labour standards they almost invariably hand down verdicts that conflict with those standards. We cannot blame judges for their ignorance of international standards since, in the past, these standards were not dealt with in our education system, but neither can we sit idly by until the future generations, who hopefully will have studied these standards in the universities, join the ranks of the judiciary.

In thanking you for your patience in hearing me out, I wish to appeal to you on behalf of the Romanian workers to display solidarity with all those who are fighting against poverty, since poverty, wherever it exists, jeopardizes the well-being of all.

Original Spanish: Mr. de ARBELOA (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) – On behalf of the employers of Venezuela, and on my own behalf, I would like to congratulate the President of the Conference and the other officers on their election.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General for his re-election, which will ensure that under his dynamic leadership, the ILO will implement as soon as possible the changes and adjustments that the times require, within the duly structured budget. Along these lines, FEDECAMARAS supports the statement made yesterday by the Chairman of the Employers' group of the Governing Body, as well as the resolution presented by the IOE to the Conference in connection with the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO.

However, as we have said on several occasions, the mere goodwill of the Director-General is not sufficient in itself. It is necessary for the Office's senior management and technical departments to take upon themselves the commitments made by the Director-General to ensure that social equity keeps pace with development, in the context of structural adjustment, the globalization of the economy and protectionist measures in international trade.

At the Regional Conference of American States held in our country last October, we saw the frustration that can arise from an unrealistic discussion of social security. At that American conference, the ILO advisers were misguided, and the Latin American countries in particular were unable to reach agreement on a system which, based upon the removal of state control of management and freedom of choice, would guarantee the quality of social protection described in the Report.

In Venezuela, as is the case in almost all the developing countries, as a consequence of the application of the macro-economic adjustment and structural measures, the improvement of social and economic protection schemes fostered behaviours of dependency and hereditary poverty – supposedly in the name of social justice, the truth is that this improvement was guided by undue electoral calculations. So now we must wonder about the consequences that this has occasioned, and wonder whether in each case what we should do is increase or decrease that protection.

As for the structural changes in the present social security schemes, our Government has opted for a complete reformulation based on various projects which make up the integral social security system covering every aspect of the life of the worker – health, pensions and retirement, unemployment, housing, food, child care, education and leisure, always with the contribution of the employers. In this area, FEDECAMARAS supports the State in guaranteeing a basic standard of living for all citizens. This has to be achieved without depleting the capacity of enterprises, and after due consultation, but above all by waging an uncompromising war against inflation through a strict austerity programme and fiscal discipline, as indicated in Chapter 3 of the Report.

With reference to the restructuring of the Venezuelan Institute of Social Security which was mentioned by our Minister in his statement, and with which FEDECAMARAS is working, we must point out that efforts are being made to remedy the inefficiency and lack of administrative control within that body by misguidedly increasing contributions. This will give the institution greater opportunities of diverting its resources, and FEDECAMARAS is against it. We agree with decentralization and deconcentration of its functions, but we feel that it will be better for the State itself to set an example by paying off its debt to that institution, of 22 billion bolivares, which it accumulated as the nation's biggest employer.

Concerning the new law on social benefits which the Ministry of Labour will soon be submitting to the National Congress, we must acknowledge that its flexibility seems to give the worker freedom of choice on the relevant arrangements and the institution where he wishes to place his pension. We welcome the willingness of the Ministry of Labour to use this opportunity for tripartite consultation, and hope that the same willingness will be shown by the Congress of the Republic which will require due advice on the subject. We urge the relevant Ministry to submit corresponding legislation before Congress, relating to pension funds, and incorporating measures which are appropriate to the national context and which should be integrated in the overall development scheme as indicated by the Director-General in the conclusions to his report.

The inexcusable events which have recently occurred in Venezuela lead us to agree with the Director-General on the principle of shared responsibility. Our developing countries cannot wait any longer for solutions in the field of social security and modernization of labour relations in order to bring about productive employment. In this connection, the ILO with its experienced and modern-thinking technical advisers must see to it that there are no repeats of the situation such as the one Venezuela has just experienced with its Labour Code, which has been objected to from the outset by FEDECAMARAS, and which has left Venezuelan enterprises no choice but to bring a complaint before this Organization. The Governing Body, as part of the solution, recommended that several sections of the Code be revised in accordance with the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). Thus, the Code will not only have to be brought into line with the spirit of the violated Conventions but also be adapted to the realities of a country facing new and serious economic difficulties.

As the Director-General says: "the demand for social protection needs to be made effective, in political, economic and institutional terms, if progress is to be achieved". The Venezuelan employers believe that in spite of the lack of stability shown a few months ago by some Venezuelan politicians which degenerated into what seems to be a political trial of our constitutional President, more recently the majority of politicians and most of the civilian society are giving a new example to Latin America and to the world of confidence and maturity with regard to economic and political objectives and trying to encourage development and the renewal of democracy. This, in cooperation with the social partners, will help to combine social protection programmes with policies concerning the labour market, in the knowledge that miracles do not happen in the realm of social protection policies and, therefore, we all have a common duty to work towards their success.

Mr. GRAY (Workers' delegate, United States) – I wish to associate myself with those who have preceded me to the rostrum in congratulating the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election, and at the same time in complimenting the Director-General on his Report, Social insurance and social protection. This topic is extremely relevant in today's world which is, we know, in the throes of adjusting to a new reality following the end of the Cold War.

This period of transition from planned economies to market economies, from party control to more open pluralistic societies, has witnessed widespread suffering by workers around the world. This is not to suggest that the transition is unwelcome. But its ultimate success will be determined in large part by the extent to which a response to the suffering is found. The issue of social insurance and social protection, therefore, is both important and timely; it must be at the centre of any effective response.

Unfortunately, at a time when the need to enhance social protection schemes is so crucial, the sad truth is that they are under attack in many countries throughout the world.

This is the case for many developed countries such as my own, where chronic budget deficits are threatening social safety nets that have existed for decades. It is not encouraging, for example, to see the current budget debate in the United States Congress includes the very real possibility of a ceiling on medical benefits for the elderly and the poor, a proposition advanced by certain members of the President's own party.

It is also the case for the countries in transition in Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. These newborn States desperately need protection for those masses of their citizens adversely affected by economic dislocation if their experiments towards a market economy are to succeed. This reality has not been given sufficient attention by the ivory-tower architects of economic reform.

And it is also unfortunately the case for the world's poorest nations whose governments are often forced into implementing severe austerity measures by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. They pay no attention to the needs of the people.

The current infatuation with a free-market model driven by an invisible hand and unencumbered by any sense of social responsibility and social justice is a direct challenge to the notion of social protection, and unless a more reasonable and human approach is adopted, the transition to market economies – as strongly advocated by the international financial institutions – will be undermined.

It is clear that the ILO and the Director-General's Report are essential components of an international solution to the problem of inadequate social insurance and social protection. There could be no hope of success without taking into account the positions put forward by the Director-General. The broad extent and comprehensive scope of these problems demand a greater effort by government, by business and by labour toward identifying and enacting a solution. Clearly, it is in the best interest of workers everywhere that we all cooperate in this effort.

Therefore, let us not overlook the importance of international labour standards and instruments other than those identified in the Director-General's Report. The development, preservation and extension of social protection are proper applications for Conventions governing the freedom of association, the right to organize, collective bargaining, unemployment, conditions of work and occupational safety and health, among others.

The fact is that many of the benefits workers around the world enjoy today were won by the strenuous efforts of trade unions. This is obviously the case for union members. But the impact of trade union efforts goes far beyond their own members. The historic campaign waged by American unions, for example, for a minimum wage and for a social security system have had their greatest impact on unorganized workers.

In a similar manner unions have contributed in a major way to the development of social safety nets in many countries throughout the world, and I have no doubt that the expansion of social protection that today's rapidly changing world so desperately requires will be directly linked to the continued positive efforts of trade unions.

In pursuit of the goals outlined in the Director-General's Report, therefore, I would like to see a rededicated effort on behalf of all the social partners to adopt, strengthen and modify basic human rights and labour relations instruments. I urge that the ILO go so far as to commit itself to the establishment of a "Workers' Bill of Rights" and to the stricter enforcement and more widespread adoption of these Conventions.

We must also recognize that the protection of social insurance programmes rests not so much with the ILO convening in Geneva as it does with the organizations and institutions around the world – labour, management and government – that have the power to implement these programmes and the responsibility to workers to carry them out. The greatest contribution the ILO can make, therefore, to the extension and protection of social insurance is to strengthen and enforce the international labour standards that unions rely on to ensure, either through collective bargaining or the legislative process, that workers receive the protection they deserve.

Original Russian: Mr. PONOMAREV (Employers' delegate, Ukraine) – On behalf of the Ukrainian Association of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, I should like to join in the congratulations addressed to the President on his election to this responsible post. I am certain that under his guidance this session of the Conference will be successful.

The Report submitted to us is a high quality, comprehensive study of the main problems of the different systems of social protection and social insurance. It defines the role and place of the ILO in the perfection of these systems very well.

In our view, the discussion of the report should result in the further development of the social protection and social insurance policies of the ILO and its member States, based on the economic and social conditions prevailing in each country.

Ukraine has declared that it is a State heading towards a social-orientated market economy, a broad-based democracy, open to cooperation in all fields and also to partnership on an equal footing with all countries of the world. This is why the topic suggested by the Director-General is so important to us.

Unlike many other countries represented at the ILO which have had long experience devising their social policies, Ukraine has to solve its social problems while drastically reforming its economy, switching to a market economy and rejecting the authoritarian approach to labour relations. Naturally this transition is not easy, given the decades-old legacy of how industrial relations and the economy were managed. The social system in the past provided our citizens with a certain amount of protection. The Director-General's Report says the countries in Eastern Europe "are fortunate in having developed systems of social protection".

Unfortunately the present structural crisis, together with the crisis brought about by the collapse of the single economy of the former USSR, has undermined the standard of living of our population. The economic crisis has dramatically affected the social sphere too. The budget deficit has limited the ability of social assistance programmes to keep pace with high inflation, and social protection is lagging behind our society's needs. The social tension in our society has now come to a boiling point. Strikes have begun in a number of places. The strikers are demanding that the Government speed up the reforms and at the same time provide the appropriate social guarantees. The President and the Government of our country have put forward a package of measures, the aim of which is to lessen the impact of price risers and to protect first and foremost the most underprivileged people, to eliminate the artificial stumbling blocks hindering the development of the economy. In particular, we would like to sell State enterprises on the stock market, speed up the privatization of small and medium-sized companies, restructure the national economy, develop national development plan for public works and improve the social protection of victims of the Chernobyl accident. We also intend to improve the banking system, to attract foreign investment and to improve a number of social guarantees. Other measures are also planned.

In these circumstances the priority for the Ukrainian Association of Industrialist and Entrepreneurs is to do anything possible to improve the economy of the country.

We are making efforts to protect the rights of manufacturers, to establish effective market structures and mechanisms, to change the rules of ownership and to ensure free enterprise. We are supporting the initiatives of joint stock, leased, cooperative and state-owned companies and organizations, and of employees, which aim at developing production in the interests of the people and the State. It is possible to declare the most lofty aims, but if they are not founded on a proper economic basis the social programmes cannot be carried out.

One of the basic tasks, we feel, is to re-establish lost scientific and technical ties and economic links between enterprises, companies, businessmen in Ukraine and the countries of the CIS, and to establish new ones.

Extensive international cooperation too is a way to overcome the crisis. Let us take for instance the problem of the conversion of former military industries. Almost 30 per cent of the active population works in such establishments. Many of these companies are operating at half capacity at best. Hundreds of thousands of workers work two to three days per week, or are on forced holidays for months on end. They have already been living below the poverty line for some time.

At the same time most of the defence industries possess the very latest technology and have on their staffs the brightest engineers and technicians and the best-qualified workers.

For these reasons we feel that when we introduce new types of production we must at the same time actively seek partners among the leading firms of the West in order to have cooperation in finding orders for our goods and to help find spare parts and help in the assembly phase. This applies first of all to machine-building, electronic companies and the metal processing industry.

By reinvigorating these companies we will solve the problem of employment and at the same time we will receive badly needed foreign currency payments. Naturally, Western companies will also benefit because they will have access to our inexpensive labour force and extensive raw materials.

This will also foster mutual confidence and will make it possible for us to engage in the most daring projects with the financing of foreign investors. We have already had positive experiences in this area with many Western companies.

We are convinced that Ukraine, given its favourable geographic situation, fertile soil and the potential of its science and human resources, will be able to take its place among the economically developed democratic countries of the world. But of course this will require years of sustained effort.

For its part, the Ukrainian Association of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs is willing to support the reforms carried out in Ukraine and to help carry out a socially-oriented policy and make its contribution to the drafting and adoption of a legal basis emphasizing tripartism, human rights and social justice for the transition to the market economy.

In conclusion, let me express my certainty that the ILO, given the wealth of its knowledge and experience, will effectively make use of its potential in order to assist in the social and economic development of member States.

Mr. ALGOO (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – As the Workers' delegate of the Republic of Mauritius, I feel honoured to be a part of proceedings of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. Allow me to congratulate the President on his election, and convey to all delegates the fraternal greetings of the working people of Mauritius.

I am particularly delighted as the agenda of the Conference is of particular interest to the Mauritian nation, which is at the threshold of the second phase of its industrial development. The interactions among delegates coming from a cross-section of cultures and different levels of industrialization will no doubt give rise to invaluable suggestions and recommendations which may be useful in the elaboration and reorientation of policies and strategies to meet the likely challenges in the social and economic fields.

Over the past two decades the rapid and successful transformation of our economy has legitimately given rise to growing expectations from all segments of society. At the same time industrialization has accelerated the process of change and the social partners and other actors in development are left with no choice but to prepare themselves to respond favourably to the new exigencies.

As government has the responsibility to provide the proper environment for enabling labour-management relations to evolve satisfactorily, we invite our Government to ratify the corresponding Conventions, especially those relating to freedom of association and the right to organize, tripartite consultations and paid educational leave. Trade union initiatives are hampered when time-off facilities for legitimate trade union activities are denied.

This year, in the wake of a review of the conditions of service in the public sector, there were no tripartite consultations before decisions were taken on the wage compensation for this year. We believe that this departure from a principle established in 1977 is more an exception for the present than a rule for the future.

Similarly, tripartite bodies existing under the law should be encouraged to perform their advisory functions more effectively in matter affecting workers' education, occupational safety and health and labour relations.

For two decades, the legal framework of our industrial relations system has been another source of discontent for the trade union movement. Free collective bargaining and industrial actions are the very essence of trade unionism; and yet, some provision of our Industrial Relations Act imposes unnecessary limits on the right to strike, and compulsory arbitration restricts further our initiatives and actions in this field.

We also believe that labour disputes should be settled very expeditiously. Unfortunately the existing institutions are performing far below expectations.

It is our hope that the forthcoming legislation on industrial relations will remedy the present situation and bring the social partners back to the negotiating table in the organized economic sectors and at the same time, conforms with the underlying philosophy of the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Occupational safety and health has become a very topical issue in our country, which is industrializing very rapidly. We have a modern legislation on the matter, an inspection service for enforcement and an information centre. But more needs to be done. Employers should place safety at work high on their agenda.

The scope of the law should be enlarged to cover the public sector, agricultural workers and tradesmen. There is need for better monitoring and coordination between the Ministries of Labour and Health. The safety and health representative needs a legal status and there should be intensive training and education. It is, therefore, my considered view that the success of any policy in the field of safety and health, besides political will, warrants the commitment and support of one and all, mainly the workers' organization.

The initiative of the ILO to consider the formulation of an international standard on the issue of part-time work is praiseworthy, although the recourse to such type of labour is quite limited in Mauritius. However, we believe that it comes at a most opportune time for us, as it will provide us the necessary guidance for preventive measures in our fast-developing economy. Although the remuneration derived from such work alleviates the family budget to some extent, in the name of social justice we cannot caution the abuse and exploitation which such workers are subject to.

I wish to bring to your attention the fate of a category of workers termed as "out-workers", who have no legal protection whatsoever, as they are not considered to be workers by definition. I am of the humble opinion that these workers too need some protection as they take home some factory work to perform in their own time. For the work, they are usually paid a rate well below that in force in the factory premises, and they do not enjoy privileges or benefits applicable to other categories of workers. I therefore appeal to this assembly to give some thoughts to this category of workers, too.

I wish to congratulate the Director-General for his comprehensive and brilliant Report, Social insurance and social protection. This Report comes at an appropriate time, when a large number of countries are implementing structural measures which have serious social repercussions on the workers and their families.

The Report is a laudable attempt to assess the level and extent of social protection in the world, and throws light on the shortcomings, deficiencies and disparities of the social security systems in many parts of the world.

In the light of this Report, on behalf of the Mauritius workers, I would urge the Government of Mauritius to undertake a review to upgrade the social security system, particularly in the relevant legislations. I am referring mainly to the National Pensions Act and the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The technical cooperation of the ILO has during the past decades been very significant, catalytic and highly beneficial to the developing world. It is therefore my considered view that ILO technical cooperation should be reinforced and continue to remain a high priority in the Organization so as to consolidate the present initiatives and to sustain the efforts of the newly democratic nations that are emerging from the collapse of the authoritarian regimes in Africa and Central and Eastern Europe, and to help them to consolidate democracy and promote development.

To conclude, I trust that my humble comments and suggestions on the various items on the agenda will meet the kind consideration of delegates present. I express my appreciation and gratitude for the opportunity to address this Conference for the first time in my new capacity as President of the Mauritius Labour Congress, which is the most representative body of the trade union movement.

Original Russian: The VICE-PRESIDENT (Mr. BADEY) – I would like to give the floor to Mr. Cilia Debono, Government delegate of Malta, for a right of reply to the statement made by Mr. Calamatta, Workers' delegate of Malta, yesterday 15 June.

Mr. CILIA DEBONO (Government delegate, Malta) – During yesterday's address to the Conference, the Workers' delegate for Malta, Mr J. Calamatta made some remarks which were not quite correct, and which could have conveyed a somewhat misleading picture.

In requesting the right of reply, it is not my intention to list the points with which the Government delegation does not agree, nor to give reasons for the disagreement.

Two particular points should, however, be clarified:

The Workers' delegate refers to "proposals" which the Government is said to have put to the tripartite Malta Council for Economic Development. It is felt that it was unethical for the Workers' delegate to have divulged, whilst they are still under discussion, what in effect are points of discussion, rather than formal proposals submitted for consideration by the three social partners, who form part of the committee set up by the Malta Council for Economic Development, specifically to discuss a question which has, after all, become very topical in many countries.

Secondly, rather than taking what the Workers' delegate calls "whirlwind decisions", rather than being "in a state of panic" and rather than having what he calls "a pension time bomb", my Government has in fact initiated a debate amongst the three social partners on a topic which is of national interest. Indeed, my Government feels that it would have been irresponsible, given the parameters of the problem, not to have initiated such a debate.

In conclusion, I would reassure everyone that my Government is examining the matter "deeply, with caution and with a clear mind". It will certainly continue to consider the views of all the parties concerned before taking any decisions. May I also reassure the Conference that any decisions that may ultimately be taken will be in the best interests of the workers and not prejudice the very high level of social security benefits which the Maltese worker has come to expect.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the tenth report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 51). I expect you all have received copies. If there are no objections I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the Report of the Committee on Apartheid, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 18.

I have pleasure in inviting Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Hernandez, Employer member, Philippines, Employer Vice-Chairman; Mrs. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada, the Worker Chairwoman; and Mr. Veltheim, Government adviser, Finland, Reporter of the Committee, to come to the rostrum.

We shall start our discussion today with the report of this Committee. This report, as you know, is one of the major contributions of the ILO to the struggle against apartheid and racial discrimination. This report is being submitted at a time when there is a wind of change and freedom blowing throughout the world and in Africa in particular. We are all witness to the democratic changes taking place in the majority of countries in the world as well as the prospects for a general agreement concerning a society free of discrimination in South Africa.

I am particularly happy therefore to invite Mr. Veltheim, Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, to present the report to us.

Mr. VELTHEIM (Government adviser, Finland; Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – I have the honour to present to the Conference the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, which is found in Provisional Record No. 18.

At its opening session on 4 June the Committee elected as its Chairman Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda, and as its Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. Hernandez, Employers' adviser, Philippines, and Mrs. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada, and myself as Reporter.

The Committee had before it the Special report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa, as well as information supplied by governments and by employers' and workers' organizations on action taken against apartheid, the report of the tenth meeting of the Group of Independent Experts, and portions of the report of the Committee on Discrimination.

The Committee's report now before the Conference consists mainly of a factual summary of the proceedings and activities of the Committee and the Working Party, and the conclusions submitted to this Conference for approval.

I would like to make a few remarks concerning the latter part of the report. The Committee had a thorough discussion on the present situation in South Africa and on the process of the multi-party negotiations now in progress. The Committee welcomed these negotiations and wishes the Conference also to give them its full support. It also noted with satisfaction that agreement has been reached on a proposed date for the elections, namely 27 April 1994; the Committee urges all parties to adhere to this date. At the same time, we felt it necessary to express in the conclusions once again the great concern about the continuing violence in South Africa which has claimed thousands of lives. This violence constitutes a major threat to the very process of negotiations for a united, non-racial and democratic society in South Africa.

The important involvement and assistance provided by the international organizations – including the United Nations – in monitoring and thus reducing violence, is also highly appreciated.

Equally important is the repeated request to the South African Government to repeal the remaining apartheid laws and to incorporate the Bantustans into the South African State before the elections.

The conclusions also stress the important role the ILO can play in the provision of technical assistance after the Transitional Executive Council has been established, and request the Director-General to formulate a plan of action. A lengthy list of items which, among others, could be incorporated in this plan is included in the conclusions.

The Committee also discussed thoroughly the future of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid. The line which was adopted reflects both firmness and flexibility. It suggests first of all that when a Transitional Executive Council is set up in South Africa, the Governing Body should be authorized under certain precise conditions to review the application of the Declaration in order to enable a plan of action to be implemented.

Furthermore, it requests the Director-General to report to the Governing Body in November on the progress made towards the elimination of apartheid, and if satisfied that conditions so require, to include a review of the Declaration on the agenda of the 81st Session of the Conference.

I will not go further into details of this report. I just wanted to focus the attention of the Conference on some important and crucial issues in this document. The report was unanimously adopted in the last meeting of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, with one personal reservation of a member of the Employers' group concerning the wording of paragraph 17. Nevertheless, since the report represents a large tripartite consensus on these complex and delicate matters, as Reporter of the Committee, I take the liberty to recommend that the Conference adopt this document unanimously.

Finally, allow me to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, Minister Ejalu, for the skilful and excellent way in which he guided the work of the Committee to a successful conclusion, and thank him for the very valuable personal support he gave me. Let me also thank the tripartite constituencies, the Employers, the Workers and the Governments, for their thoughtful contributions in the preparation of this document. I also thank the Governments for their constructive participation in the drafting process. Lastly, I would like to thank the secretariat of the Office, in particular Mr. Abdel-Rahman, Mrs. Perret-Nguyen and Mr. Rubin, for their valuable advice and indefatigable dedication.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada; Vice-Chairwoman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – My first regret is to say that I thought this hall would be full today on this very important subject. I can understand the fact that there are those who are working in committees that are important also, but in the case of governments and their representatives and those delegations that are not in committees, I regret very much that they are not here in this hall.

I would like to begin by thanking most sincerely the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of the Republic of Uganda, who presided not only admirably but also very wisely over our deliberations. I would also like to express our gratitude for the good work done by Mr. Veltheim, Reporter of the Committee and Chairman of the Working Party, who had a very difficult job trying as best as he could to reconcile the views of the three constituent parties during the sittings. I would also like to express our appreciation to Mr. Hernandez, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, and his colleagues in the Employers' group. Without their wisdom and contribution it would have been very difficult to arrive at the conclusions which are now before you.

The Committee had before it the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the report of the Group of Independent Experts as well as the Report of the Committee on Discrimination to the 256th Session of the Governing Body.

The Committee took note of the resumption of the multi-party negotiations in South Africa on 1 April 1993 after almost 11 months since they were broken off following the Boipatong massacre. This time 26 organizations are participating in the talks, including the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania and the Conservative Party.

Although it appears that the negotiating partners are tackling the fundamental issues which will politically shape the new South Africa, the African National Congress and the Government are very much aware that the process is increasingly vulnerable and volatile. In fact, yesterday we learned that the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) and the right-wing groupings have pulled out of the negotiations.

The assassination of Chris Hani on Easter Saturday ignited the anger of the marginalized township youth, who were beginning to lose patience and faith in the negotiation process which was dragging its feet. This growing frustration was displayed on one placard at Hani's funeral which read: "Mandela released three years ago: South Africa still not free". With the murder of Chris Hani, the right-wing and elements in the security forces showed their potential power in trying to derail the negotiations.

While assessing the progress made at the multi-party forum, the Committee noted that stability and security issues have become very important to the ANC and the Government. The prevailing political situation is pushing them as the main negotiating partners to hasten towards an early settlement. The ANC was prepared to make some major concessions to speed up the negotiation process. The ANC was also prepared to reconsider its demand to have the security forces merged with the armed wings of the ANC, PAC, IFP and other movements. It was also agreed that the new Constitution would provide for some form of regional government, as was requested by the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP). The IFP was insisting that the form of government be determined before the election of the constituent assembly. On the other hand, the National Party – pre-empting a landslide victory for the ANC in the constituent assembly – was determined to curb as far as possible the powers of an elected constitutional body. Two weeks ago, the ANC was forced to make another major concession that the present multi-party negotiation forum would determine the outlines of the future Constitution for a democratic South Africa. The effect was that the constitutional principles and the powers and functions of the regions would now be determined by the multi-party forum and not by the constituent assembly.

Now, this demonstrates how and why the present talks are fragile and vulnerable.

Therefore our Committee on Action against Apartheid, after debating lengthily on these issues, has arrived at the conclusion that appropriate forms of pressure must be maintained on South Africa as a lever to speed up the process of change in line with the United Nations Resolution 47/116A of 7 December 1992 and until the apartheid system has been eradicated completely and hopefully forever.

I am sure that you all agree with me in this hall that the international community should not relax its vigilance. Appropriate pressure must continue to be applied by the ILO's constituents for the ending of apartheid and its evil effects. I remind you that apartheid is yet to be dismantled.

However, the Committee welcomed the tentative date which has now been fixed for the first ever one-person one-vote election to be held on 27 April 1994. But this proposed date has to be agreed and ratified by the multi-party forum on 25 June 1993.

I understand that some governments, and hopefully not mine – the Government of Canada – are eager to lift all remaining economic sanctions after the final date for elections has been agreed upon. To us, it is the democratic election of a non-racial constituent assembly which is the irreversible process and not the date of the election itself.

However, if there is still anyone who has some doubts on whether apartheid is still alive, let me just say this. Some apartheid laws, including the Electoral Act of 1979, the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act and other laws in the field of education, welfare and social services still exist in South Africa. The tricameral Parliament denying representation to black South Africans is still in place. People residing in the bantustans are still denied South African citizenship. We must insist that apartheid cannot be reformed but has to be totally eradicated.

The Committee also examined the situation regarding the extension of labour legislation to all workers in South Africa. The proposals made so far remain unsatisfactory, particularly those concerning farm workers and the public service which contain severe restrictions on trade union rights.

Actually, there are about 1.5 million farm workers in South Africa employed on 67,500 farming units. Working conditions remain amongst the worst in any sector. Many farm workers are paid a combination of cash and kind; if yields are low because of drought, etc., then payments in kind are also reduced. There is an appalling "tot" system where farm workers are paid in wine and their dependency on alcohol is encouraged to keep them in line. The homes of farm workers are tied with their jobs and so if they lose their jobs, obviously, they also lose their homes. The employers' organization, which is the South African Agricultural Union, has consistently tried to prevent the extension of basic labour legislation. The farmers have held demonstrations together with the right-wing political groups and vowed not to respect the new laws which have become effective as from 1 May 1993. However, to our regret, the Basic Conditions of Work Act does not provide for basic trade union rights, freedom of association and fair wages.

The Committee also examined the issue of political violence which continues to claim the lives of many thousands of innocent people, hundreds of thousands of workers also, including women and children. Many others have been seriously injured and maimed for life. The victims of violence include an extremely small percentage of whites, but blacks continue to bear the brunt of it all. All the parties in South Africa, and particularly the Government, should take appropriate steps to put an end to this carnage, and the international community should also strengthen its role in monitoring the violence. Therefore, the question of violence figures prominently in our conclusions.

As spokeswoman of the Workers' group of this Committee, allow me to express our high appreciation to the Director-General for his excellent Report on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. However, we would have liked to see a much more comprehensive section on the violence and its impact on workers and their families. We certainly agree with his assessment, that "the next few months will be crucial in determining the pace and the form of the transition" to democracy in South Africa.

We know that apartheid has yet to be eradicated. We have to be cautious in the positions we are going to adopt at this session of the Conference concerning ILO action against apartheid. I need not repeat the arguments developed by Mr. Cunningham Ngucana of NACTU and Mr. Jay Naidoo of COSATU who both addressed our Committee. They requested the ILO to assume its full responsibility in order that apartheid be eliminated in all its forms. They also appealed to the ILO to assist the independent trade union movement in the different fields within its competence, particularly education, training and technical assistance for economic reconstruction and development. These concerns have been expressed in paragraph 17 of the conclusions.

We believe that at this critical phase of the negotiation process we must be careful not to send the wrong signals to the South African Government or to forces inside South Africa which are against the democratic change. However, we do express the hope that the ongoing multi-party negotiations will pave the way towards a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa.

Therefore, it is expected that a Transitional Executive Council – which is sometimes called the TEC – will be established soon. Along with it an electoral commission and an independent media commission will be set up. The main task of the TEC will be to ensure the creation of the necessary conditions for free and fair elections. It is also expected that a Transition to Democracy Act will be enacted to provide a legal framework for the transition. The country will then be governed on the basis of this Act until the adoption of a new Constitution.

As it can be seen, there is still a long way to go on the road to democracy. I am sure that Nelson Mandela would never have thought that the last mile he was asking all of us to walk with him on 8 June 1990 from this very rostrum would be so long and so difficult. We have taken due consideration of the above time-frames and the expected developments in the near future while drafting the conclusions.

During the work of the Committee, we also examined the excellent report made by the Group of Independent Experts. Their findings and recommendations have been very helpful to our work and I wish to place on record our deep appreciation for their contribution. We noted that while the number of replies from the workers' organizations continued to increase, the number of replies from governments has declined and was below the figure from 1992. It is regrettable that activities against apartheid are diminishing at this very crucial period and before a political settlement has been reached. This is a matter of concern to us at a time when the urgency of the transformation process from apartheid to a democratic society places a high responsibility on the international community for the future rebuilding of South Africa. In our Committee, we also deplored that the member States of the European Community, with the exception of one country, had not provided individual replies to the questionnaire. I wonder how long it will take for them to learn that those countries must report individually. I regret that we have to raise this problem again this year in this session because the EEC does not have the status of a member country, and therefore this practice has to be discontinued.

The conclusions and recommendations, which I am commending to you on behalf of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, reflect the wishes and aspirations of the great majority of the population of South Africa. They are also fully supported by the independent and democratic South African trade union organizations. We, the Workers' group, have analysed the present situation in South Africa and are consistent in our stand concerning the ILO action against apartheid. May I recall that the Workers' Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Discrimination, at the meeting of 26 May 1993, made the following statement, and I quote: "If there was no early agreement on a transitional government, the Declaration would remain in force, but the Conference could work out a plan of action that would be set into motion when there was such a government and when the non-racial democratic workers' and employers' organizations indicated that this was appropriate." This is exactly what is reflected in the conclusions before you. Unfortunately, during the adoption of the conclusions we had to take a vote on three occasions on the use of some specific words. However, an overwhelming majority voted for the wording in the present text of the conclusions. I hope that a spirit of understanding will prevail which will lead this session to adopt these conclusions unanimously. The adoption of the Committee's report and its conclusions must be seen as a condemnation of apartheid. It must also be seen as a condemnation of political violence, and it has to be seen as full support for the process of negotiations under way in South Africa into creating a unified, non-racial and democratic society.

Finally, I wish to thank all the members of the Committee, the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Abdul Rahman, and his colleagues from the secretariat, as well as the interpreters whose dedication and commitment were very much appreciated by all of us.

South Africa will be free one day. Black people will be free to vote democratically like the rest of us in this hall. Only then will South Africa be accepted fully into the total world community, and that will come one day also. We on the Workers' benches believe in miracles. Miracles sometimes occur. But my friends, when you want a miracle to happen you have to work very, very hard. And this day of freedom for South Africa will surely be one of those miracles!

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' adviser, Philippines; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – It is with immense pleasure that I convey to the President, on behalf of the Employers in this Conference in general and the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines in particular, my warmest congratulations on his election to the chair of this session of the International Labour Conference.

As Employers' spokesman and Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I have no doubt that, given the manner in which he is presiding over the deliberations and debates in this assembly, this session of the Conference will yield fruitful and meaningful results.

May I be permitted to pay special tribute to all the members of the Committee and its Working Party, particularly to the Chairman, Mr. Ejalu, the distinguished Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, to the Workers' Vice-Chairwoman, my friend Mrs. Carr, President Emeritus of the Canadian Labour Congress, and to the Reporter, Ambassador Veltheim of Finland, for formulating and adopting the Committee's report and conclusions as contained in Provisional Record No. 18, which I commend most respectfully and most earnestly to this Conference for your unanimous adoption.

May I also thank the representative of the Director-General and his staff, interpreters and secretariat, and may I pay special tribute to Mr. Jean Dejardin, the Coordinator of the Employers' group, for representing the International Organization of Employers.

During the deliberations in the Committee, we welcomed the positive and encouraging developments in South Africa and took due note of the significant progress made during the previous year in the transition from apartheid to democracy in South Africa. While we noted the violence in South Africa and expressed concern about it and about other problems that could interrupt the political negotiations, we were nevertheless encouraged with the progress being made towards the creation of a non-racist society.

We considered that the perpetrators of violence were a small minority who would soon be overwhelmed by the major players who had laid the basis for an agreement, and that any delay, disruption or deviation in the negotiations would not fundamentally alter the democratic course that the major players had set.

We welcomed the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa and shared his optimism regarding the continuing expansion of the democratic horizon in South Africa.

Needless to say, all freedom-loving peoples all over the world expected that, inevitably, a politically stable democratic government that recognized equality and justice and human rights, regardless of race, colour, religion, creed and belief, would be established in South Africa.

We noted during the Committee's deliberations that practically all apartheid laws had been repealed and that laws on labour and social policy were being rewritten and restructured on the basis of the 1992 ILO Report of the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning the Republic of South Africa.

We noted that a new National Manpower Commission with tripartite composition had been established and that the National Economic Forum was functioning. All these were positive indicators of the encouraging developments that were taking place in South Africa.

We welcomed the proposed date of 27 April 1994 for the general elections for a constituent assembly that would frame and adopt a constitution for a non-racial, independent, democratic and fully representative South Africa.

In view of these encouraging developments, we shared with the Workers' bench and the governments represented on our committee a sense of the need for the ILO to render the necessary technical assistance to prepare the peoples of South Africa for the eventual emergence of a democratic republic and, as mentioned by Mrs. Carr, that feeling has been expressed in paragraph 17 of the conclusions of the Committee.

To be sure, the unanimous adoption of the Committee's Report and conclusions would serve as a clear, unmistakable and urgent reminder to the South African Government that it must hasten the total demise of apartheid and all its repulsive features, which have impinged upon human dignity and quenched the spark of God's divinity in every one of His creation.

It is imperative that multiparty negotiations should continue in earnest so that a non-racial transitional executive council can soon be set up. We would of course lament any disruption of such negotiations and express the hope that no parties to the negotiations shall withdraw therefrom.

It is our fervent hope likewise that the free and democratic elections scheduled for 27 April 1994 can take place and that a constituent assembly will formulate a constitution for a non-racial democratic South Africa.

The Committee's conclusions underscore our efforts to respond constructively to the concerns of all sectors and the request for assistance. We trust that they will provide guidance and instructions for the International Labour Organization and the Director-General in clear and positive terms so that they can respond constructively, speedily and effectively to the changing and expanding needs in South Africa. The conclusions include a proposal for a plan of action in paragraph 17, which we hope will be implemented by the ILO as soon as an interim government or a transitional executive council is established in South Africa to prepare its people for the eventual emergence of a much-awaited united, non-racial, fully representative and democratic republic.

This plan of action is in response to the concerns of groups in South Africa and in this connection we would like to take note of the statement made by Mr. Jay Naidoo, Secretary-General of the Congress of South African Trade Unions, when he took the floor during the Committee's meeting last week and I quote: "The conclusions that have been adopted provide a good basis for addressing the needs of the majority in South Africa, through job creation, improvements in the standards of living, education and training, and the development of strong tripartite institutions. It is envisaged that such ILO technical cooperation will take the form of a programme of action to give assistance to the democratic trade unions and tripartite institutions after the entry into force of the transitional executive council in the next month or two. The declaration will then be reviewed at the next Governing Body meeting and considered at the next International Labour Conference".

The conclusions emphasize primarily our concerns and our hope that South Africa will in the immediate future join the ranks of the ILO constituency.

The horizon of democracy is widening and the frontiers of freedom and dignity are expanding in South Africa. Let us complete the last mile and reaffirm our adherence to the fundamental principle stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity. Let us unanimously adopt the report and conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Mr. EJALU (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda; Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – First of all I would like to acknowledge that the room is a bit fuller than when my two colleagues started speaking, so I congratulate the Conference on that.

In accordance with the practice and tradition of this prestigious Conference, I have been honoured, as an African Minister and an internationalist, to have chaired the Committee on Action against Apartheid. It is, first of all, my pleasure to pay special tribute to the valuable contributions of Mr. Hernandez of the Philippines who has been elected Employer Vice-Chairman, and Mrs. Carr from Canada, who has been elected Worker Vice-Chairwoman. As you will have remarked from their statements, their insight into and extensive knowledge of the subject-matter at hand and their effective leadership of the various groups really helped me, as Chairman, because they provided information on all the substantive issues, they articulated their various positions and that is how we managed to draw up this report which, I think, is a very good report indeed. I would like also to thank Mr. Veltheim, Government member, Finland, who was elected as our Reporter. He has done an excellent job and I thank him for it. I would also like to thank Mr. Abdel-Rahman, the representative of the Secretary-General on the Committee, and his team, including the interpreters, for their wise counsel, ready assistance and for their endurance. Even when the Committee ran out of time they were at hand to assist the Committee.

The Committee, in a spirit of cooperation, had a frank discussion on the issues arising from the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid and the reports of the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination.

The changes taking place in South Africa offer hope that the complete elimination of apartheid is not far off. Yet, the continuing violence in the country and the threats from the ominous extreme white right-wing groups and the black sectarianists and separatists are a cause for concern that the process of negotiations for a non-racial democratic South Africa may be delayed, thus postponing the demise of apartheid.

The conclusions in the Committee's report, in my view, are balanced and reflect these feelings of opportunism and caution. The Committee invites this session of the Conference to urge the negotiating parties to set up the Transitional Executive Council or transitional authority as soon as possible. The designation of 27 April as a tentative date for elections to a Constituent Assembly to draw up a new Constitution for a non-racial democratic South Africa is a positive and welcome development. I hope that all the parties at the multi-party negotiating forum will strive to adhere to that date.

The Committee has wisely requested the Conference to call upon the South African Government to expedite change by taking steps immediately to remove the remaining discriminatory apartheid legislation and to begin redressing the imbalances in education, health, housing and social welfare. South Africa should also, as a matter of urgency, extend labour legislation to domestic and farmworkers and workers in the public sector and this legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down by the ILO.

There has been much progress in the process of dismantling apartheid. The ILO and the rest of the international community must play their part to make sure that the progress and process is not derailed and delayed. Hence the Committee invites the Conference to request all governments to maintain appropriate forms of pressure on South Africa.

As we look forward to the establishment of the Transitional Executive Council in the near future and the election to a Constituent Assembly early next year, the Committee feels that the ILO should give maximum assistance to non-racial democratic trade unions, employers' organizations and other democratic forces in South Africa so that they can play a full part in the elections and ensure that they are free and fair.

The Committee on Action against Apartheid stresses the important role to be played by the ILO in providing technical assistance after the establishment of the Transitional Executive Council, to help in the transformation to non-racial democracy in South Africa.

There is great hope for the future, but for that future to be secure, the South African Government must heed the caution expressed by the Committee and immediately adopt and implement the recommendations and the conclusions of the Committee's report.

I personally would like to appeal to the Conference to adopt this report by consensus. This in itself would send a robust and clear message to the parties in South Africa that the rest of the world would like to see a democratic South Africa and I hope that in the not too distant future the International Labour Conference will be a welcoming a tripartite delegation of South Africa into its ranks.

On a personal note, this is the last time that Mrs. Carr will be attending the International Labour Conference. I would like to pay tribute to her contribution over the years as a staunch fighter for human and trade union rights and to her special contribution to the struggle against apartheid. I wish her, and I am sure the Conference wishes her, very well.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – On behalf of all of you we would like to express our sincerest thanks to the Committee for the excellent report which provides much information and also reproduces a large number of statements condemning apartheid in South Africa.

The general discussion is now open.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – I should like to thank the Director-General for his lucid Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa. I also thank the officers and members of the Committee on Apartheid for their excellent report and conclusions.

It is evident from the Director-General's Special Report and the report and conclusions of the Committee that some progress has been made towards the elimination of apartheid, even if much remains to be done. However, the violence in South Africa, which many believe is organized by sections of the minority Government's security forces, makes it hard for one to trust the de Klerk Government. Any keen observer of the South African situation will know that the "organized" violence unleashed on the South African people is an attempt by the minority racists to delay the total eradication of apartheid and the installation of a democratic, non-racial majority government in South Africa. What the organizers of this violence should remember is that violence provokes counter-violence and instability, and no investor will invest anything in a politically unstable country. It is therefore in their own interests and in the interests of South Africa that the violence should be stopped.

The Organization of African Trade Union Unity would like to warn the ILO and the international community not to be complacent about the modest change that has taken place in South Africa. Minor manifestations of apartheid have been eliminated in South Africa, but apartheid is still alive.

A number of key apartheid laws are still on South Africa's statute books. These include: the Electoral Act of 1979; the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act; and a number of other apartheid laws on education, housing and social welfare.

Until all these oppressive apartheid laws are abolished, the structure of apartheid destroyed and a democratically elected government put in place, nobody can claim that apartheid is dead and buried in South Africa. Even after the death of apartheid, righting the wrongs perpetuated under apartheid against the oppressed majority in South Africa that has been suffering for decades will be an urgent issue, especially in such areas as education, health, housing and employment.

In the light of all this, we regard it as premature and unlawful for the present minority racist Government in South Africa to restructure the South African economy, particularly with regard to the privatization of government-owned enterprises. Selling government-owned enterprises under the guise of privatization at this time, when the oppressed majority of South Africans have been denied their social, political and economic rights for more than 50 years, will amount to robbery by the racist regime and its white minority supporters.

The Organization of African Trade Union Unity supports the view that the ILO should continue to apply the provisions of the Declaration until all the props of apartheid in South Africa are demolished. However, once the transition Executive Council has been established and the Constituent Assembly elected, the Governing Body can suspend the Declaration.

The OATUU expresses its appreciation and gratitude to the ILO and international donor agencies for the financial, material and technical assistance given to South Africa's democratic, non-racial trade unions, COSATU and NACTU, and to the other anti-apartheid democratic forces which have helped these organizations considerably in their fight against apartheid. In this "last mile" of the struggle we appeal to the ILO and the international donor agencies to redouble their assistance to those organizations to enable them to hasten the death of apartheid. Assistance, especially in the field of workers' education, voter education and registration, and popular participation, in the form of workshops and seminars, will be of immense importance to these organizations.

The Organization of African Trade Union Unity fully endorses the conclusions and recommendations of the report of the Committee on Apartheid and calls on the Conference to adopt them unanimously.

Mr. KAILEMBO (representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing 113 million members from all over the world, I would like to express my unflinching support for the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid as contained in Provisional Record No. 18. I trust and hope that the report of the Committee and its conclusions will be unanimously adopted so as to send a clear message to the South African Government that the agonizing, horrendous apartheid system must be eradicated and replaced by a united, non-racial and democratic society. I would also like to congratulate the Chairman and the members of the Committee for their painstaking and dedicated work to uphold the cherished principles and ideals of democracy, freedom, equality and social justice for the overwhelming majority of people still suffering under the yoke of the most despised system of apartheid. Over a number of years the Committee, through its laudable work, has contributed immensely towards strengthening the ILO further as the champion of human and trade union rights and social justice.

Although we welcome the positive developments which have taken place so far in the negotiation process, despite delays and setbacks last year, we consider the situation in South Africa to be increasingly volatile. The ongoing talks are still threatened by the extreme right-wing parties and the forces within and outside the Government which are opposed to a democratic change and was already reported, two days ago, that the Inkatha Freedom Party, the Conservative Party and their allies were considering pulling out of the talks.

The cold-blooded murder of Chris Hani on 10 April, only a few days after the negotiations started, demonstrated the potential power of the hidden forces of the right-wing to threaten the reform process.

I wish therefore to stress the need for the international community not to relax its pressure on the South African Government until the democratic trade unions, COSATU and NACTU, and the liberation movements advise otherwise. Constant and continuous international pressure has been one of the factors instrumental in bringing about a process of change towards the creation of a non-racial and democratic society.

The proposed election date of 27 April 1994 has still to be agreed upon by the multi-party forum next week. Therefore the ICFTU will not relax its vigilance and will continue to urge the international community to exert appropriate forms of pressure on the South African Government, in line with the United Nations resolution of December last year, in order to bring about an early abolition of apartheid.

A resolution adopted at the 11th Regional Conference of the ICFTU African Regional Organization in Harare, Zimbabwe, on 2-3 April 1993, emphasizes that only when a new democratic constitution is in place, which provides for a one-person, one-vote system in a free, non-racial society, will it mean that the changes are irreversible.

Hence, it is clear that apartheid has by no means been buried yet. Some major apartheid laws have still not been repealed. These include the Constitution Act of 1983, which established the tricameral parliament, the Electoral Act of 1979, the Bantu Homelands Citizenship Act, which made blacks alien in their own country, South Africa. Moreover, the workers in the bantustans continue to be denied trade union rights.

Tragic violence, which has become a feature of life in South Africa, constitutes a major threat to the democratization process. On the eve of Hani's funeral, there was a chilling reminder that South Africa's notorious "third force" is still alive. The massacre of 21 black people in Sebokeng township by a vanload of gunmen, led apparently by a disguised white driver, had all the hallmarks of a classic "third force" operation. Nobody in this hall will deny the urgent necessity to put an end to this continuing political violence. The ICFTU therefore sent a high-level fact-finding mission to South Africa from 1 to 3 February 1993 to look into the violence and to examine how best to extend international solidarity to the independent and democratic South African trade unions at the present time. The mission concluded that the South African Government was directly or indirectly involved in the violence.

Following this mission, the independent non-racial trade union organizations, COSATU and NACTU, together with some ICFTU affiliates in industrialized countries, took the initiative to establish a Trade Union Violence Monitoring Group in order to monitor violence, violations of trade union rights and attacks on trade unionists and to mobilize international solidarity actions. The ICFTU is fully supporting the group in its efforts to monitor the prevailing violence and calls for a greater role to be played by the international observers from the United Nations, the Organization for African Unity the Commonwealth and the European Community. The ICFTU mission on violence also recommended that maximum assistance should be made available to the democratic trade union movement in the field of voter education and democratic practice.

Voter education is very crucial for elections in South Africa. The urgency to embark on a massive education campaign was underlined by both COSATU's General Secretary, Jay Naidoo, and NACTU's General Secretary, Cunningham Ngucana, when they spoke at the meetings of the tripartite committee on Action against Apartheid.

On 15 March 1993, Popo Molefe, head of the ANC's Elections Commission, told a seminar that South Africa's coming election would be fundamentally different from the elections in the other democracies. To understand the magnitude of the task ahead, it is useful to note that an estimated 21.6 million people will be eligible to vote in these elections. Of these, 78 per cent have never taken part in an election before, and more than half of these cannot read or write. The problem is even more acute among women, particularly those living in the rural areas. Deeply engrossed in their day-to-day struggle to live, and because of cultural traditions, they may be apathetic and leave voting to their husbands.

On the other hand, all white voters are registered and have taken part in elections before. The National Party, which has large resources and electoral experience, has no keen interest in enabling the majority to vote.

In this regard, the ICFTU Committee on Human and Trade Union Rights which met last week has approved a decision to launch a project to assist the democratic trade union organizations urgently to organize voter education programmes. We urge the ILO also to assist the non-racial South African trade union movement in this gigantic task.

While the trade unionists have to devote themselves to providing the above additional services to the workers, it has been brought to our attention that political developments in the country have not led to a reduction in the number of arrests and dismissals of trade unionists. Massive collective arrests and dismissals took place during the course of industrial disputes, highlighting the absence of legal protection of strikers. It has been reported that employers continued their collusion with the security forces to repress strikes and disputes with violence. One hundred and ninety members of the construction workers' union (CAWU), 371 members of the teachers' union (SADTU) and 396 NEHAHU members in the health sector were thus arrested. Thirty-one NUMSA members and 30 POTWA members were also arrested recently. In this context, therefore, I fully support the Committee's request that the South African police force should be reformed so as to enable it to adapt and develop itself from a force dedicated only to law enforcement to one which can respond to the needs of the community.

COSATU and NACTU leaders are living in insecure conditions, their lives being under constant threat. Two weeks ago, the house of NACTU's General Secretary, Cunningham Ngucana was raided by police. This has also happened a couple of times before. The ICFTU strongly condemns the South African Government for this outrageous act. It also condemns the nationwide raid against the PAC's offices and the arrest of 77 of its members on 25 May 1993.

I wish to associate myself with the Worker Vice-Chairwoman of the Committee to request that the South African Government should also expedite measures to extend labour legislation to all workers in South Africa, including those in the bantustans. We have also noted with concern that the proposals made so far concerning legislation to cover the public sector and farm and domestic workers, contain substantial restrictions on trade union rights. Furthermore, we have learnt that some provisions in the draft Child Care Act would entrench and further expand the exploitation of children, particularly in agriculture. It appears that employers will be permitted to hire children between the ages of 12 and 15 for pocket money, subject to certain restrictions on hours and conditions of work.

The ICFTU has continued to provide every form of assistance to the independent trade union movement in the field of organization, education and institutional building, in addition to legal and relief assistance. This assistance has been coordinated through the ICFTU Coordinating Committee on South Africa and it will continue.

At its meeting from 9 to 11 December 1992, the ICFTU Executive Board adopted a statement in support of the Democratic Trade Union Movement in South Africa in the transitional period, pledging the assistance of the international free trade union movement to the democratic South African trade union organization in addressing the socio-economic inequalities, particularly in the fields of education, health, housing and social welfare.

You will recall that last year, on the recommendation of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, the Conference called on the Government of Malawi to release immediately the Malawian trade union leader, Chakufwa Chihana. Moreover, at the end of last year and early this year, the ICFTU jointly with the South African Trade Union Coordinating Council (SATUCC) sent two high-level missions to meet President Banda and other government ministers in order to request the unconditional release of our colleague. I am pleased to report to this session of the Conference that Brother Chihana was released last Saturday. I wish to express our thanks to the ILO for its prompt action in this case of violation of trade union rights, and I would also like to take this opportunity, on behalf of my organization, to express thanks to all the trade union organizations who are members of this august assembly for the pressure which they have been able to put on the Malawi Government, thanks to which Chakufwa Chihana is alive and well.

Finally, I would like to express the ICFTU's fullest support for the request of Mrs. Carr, Workers' Vice-Chairwoman of the Committee, that the Report be endorsed unanimously by the Conference so as to send an unequivocal and clear message to the South African Government that we wish to see the elimination of the abhorrent system of apartheid very soon.

Mr. MAKHANDA (representative of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania) – Please allow me to wish all of you grace and peace.

On behalf of the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania and its President, Clarence Mlamli Makwetu, who was to address this august body today but was prevented from doing so by some unforeseen circumstances beyond his control, allow me to congratulate Mr. Abdel-Hak on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 80th Session. I am more than confident that he will successfully steer this Conference to its objectives. His country, Egypt, is one of those that have been in the forefront of our struggle since the 1960s. We not only received from it moral support but also material resources. I am also proud, on a personal note, to be a graduate of one of Egypt's colleges outside Zamalek.

I must also congratulate the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, for several reasons. First, for his reelection to a well-deserved second term. Second, for the incisiveness of his Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa. Third, for his promise to assist Africa. Very few public figures keep their word after taking office, not out of malice or out of dishonesty. The Director-General has lived up to his promises. He has even visited Africa on several occasions. My delegation wishes him well and prays that God will give him strength and wisdom in his endeavour.

May I also be allowed to extend our congratulations to Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour, Uganda, and Chairman of the Committee, to Mrs. Carr, the Workers' Vice-Chairwoman, Mr. Hernandez, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, and also to the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Abdel-Rahman. I also wish to acknowledge the front-line States and those governments that have supported us, and all the members of the bureau and the secretariat for having helped us in getting this far in our struggle for justice, peace, prosperity and democracy.

On 6 March 1993 at the World Trade Centre in Kempton Park, South Africa, we seem to have at last set ourselves on the path to wrestle with the dismantling of apartheid, in accordance with the wishes of our people and members of the international community. The details of these events are aptly recorded in the Director-General's Report and its supplements. I would only like to mention here that we in the Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC) have been able to participate because this forum met our former objections to CODESA.

The new forum, which met on 1 April 1993, was highly representative and inclusive (26 organizations and parties participated and are participating). It is transparent, not only to the printed media but also to the electronic media. All parties and organizations, including the party in power, have equal influence in the deliberations and decisions of this multi-party forum. Its decisions should therefore assist this body as to the progress being made towards democratization in our country. No single organization or individual can now issue statements about any major action that has not been agreed to by the plenary of this forum.

The PAC's programme for a new dispensation has been very precise, concise and comprehensive. Since we last met here, we had the opportunity to hold bilateral meetings with the delegations of the party in power, led by the Foreign Minister, Mr. Pik Botha. Both of these meetings took place in Gaberone, Botswana. The last meeting in Gaberone included members of the South African Defence Force and the police and, on our side, the Commanders of the Azanian People's Liberation Army (APLA).

In the first bilateral meeting, we both agreed on the need for elections and hoped to start the machinery going, at least by starting up a registration process as early as last March. The second meeting ended in a deadlock, but all parties agreed to keep the lines of communication open.

Our demand was and is for the establishment of a transitional authority (TA) with full executive and legislative powers in areas of the budget, security forces, media and elections. The TA would arrange for elections for a constituent assembly to draw up a Constitution, to be held under the most stable of conditions as soon as possible. We are therefore happy that the conclusions before you have captured in a very clear form that wish of our people. We therefore ask, request and plead for an unconditional adoption of these conclusions.

We have had other bilateral meetings with a number of participants in the multi-party negotiation forum. An overwhelming majority of them, including those from the so-called Bantustans ("homelands") and traditional chiefs are in agreement with the broad principles of our positions. We have continued to enjoy their support in the various structures of the forum.

It is our firm belief and conviction that, unless the armed forces in South Africa are brought under joint control of all parties in the forum, our country will never experience peace and stability, and as a consequence be unable to restore investor confidence and economic growth. I am not going to enumerate here, for lack of time, the litany of violence raging inside South Africa since we last met. Nor can we honestly say we hope to have in the near future free and fair elections under such conditions. Here again we wish to be on record as appreciating the Committee's sensitivity to this issue in their conclusions.

Some of the critical points in the conclusions before you concerning issues will be dealt with very adequately by my compatriot from the African National Congress. Allow me to conclude by elaborating on the following.

My organization has been portrayed as radical, racist and bent on eliminating white compatriots. Nothing could be further from the truth. I have told you what our objectives are. Is seeking genuine negotiations, democracy and peace racist or radical?

A number of allegations have been made in the media about our military component structures killing white women and children and, more recently, white farmers. Suspects to these deeds have been apprehended. They were found to be connected to liberation organizations, but not to the PAC or APLA. The media never published these facts with the vigour they did against the PAC. One wonders what happened to their honesty, integrity and professionalism.

On 25 May 1993, the Minister of Law and Order, Mr. Huines Kriel, unleashed his forces against the PAC nationwide in the early hours of the morning. This was done in a truly Gestapo fashion. No one was spared, including our President's residences. Seventy-two leaders and members were dragged to jails all over the country. The Minister and State President de Klerk assured the populace on national television that criminal evidence had been collected over time connecting us, the PAC, to murders and killings.

Seventy-two hours after these arrests, the only charges that could be brought were made against four of our members, namely, that they possessed illegal ammunition – not even arms. The negotiating council vigorously took the Minister to task in a five-hour public debate, which was carried live on television, not only for failing to come out with evidence against the PAC, but also because the Minister had always been against the PAC's continued participation in the forum. A number of those who had been arrested included members of our negotiating team.

We are committed to a peaceful resolution of the conflict in our country. We are committed to a cessation of all hostilities. But this must be mutual. Our history and long experience in this struggle have taught us that where power is concerned, logic, wisdom and truth must reign supreme.

In conclusion I would like to thank most profusely the Group of Independent Experts. They have displayed a high level of professionalism and intellectual honesty in carrying out their mandate. We, in the PAC, are so much the richer because of their work. A free and democratic South Africa/Azania will have a place for their professionalism. The events at the World Trade Centre on 15 June have vindicated their assessment and ours that the Declaration must be maintained until apartheid is completely and irrevocably dismantled with the adoption of a non-racial and democratic Constitution.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – On behalf of the Nordic trade unions, I wish wholeheartedly to endorse the conclusions of the Committee on Apartheid. It is my privilege and pleasure to reaffirm our friendship and solidarity with, and our full support for, our trade union sisters and brother in South Africa, COSATU and NACTU.

I particularly share the concern expressed by the Group of Independent Experts in their report on action against apartheid. There is a serious danger that assistance is declining at a time when the need for it is growing. One phase we hope, is ending – although it has not ended yet – while another phase is beginning – of construction and reorientation, community – and institution-building, cooperation and conciliation.

For this new phase we need both a plan of action and the resources for it. The outline of such a plan is to be found in paragraph 17 of the conclusions. For some time, and certainly since the Harare Conference in May last year, we have been putting together the elements of such a plan, which is the ILO contribution to a better, democratic future and the social improvements it will bring.

The Director-General will no doubt report in greater detail to the November Session of the Governing Body on the formulation of this plan so that further positive decisions can be taken. The November Session will in any case have to discuss in some depth the follow-up to these Conference decisions. We can only hope and pray that conditions will then be ripe for reviewing the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid.

The situation in South Africa is and remains volatile. What is clear at any event is that action against apartheid will be on the agenda of the 1994 Conference. I understand paragraph 21 of the conclusions to mean that a review of the Declaration will be put on the agenda should the situation improve, that is, if a transitional executive council is set up and the other elements of the long-awaited decisive turn away from apartheid become reality. Naturally, the Conference should then also be informed of the plan of action and the progress made in its implementation.

If there are no such positive developments, if there is no decisive change, or – even worse – if the situation deteriorates and our hopes turn sour, then the Declaration and the action it proposes will remain in force and will remain a normal agenda item for the Committee on Apartheid.

This all boils down to the fact that the Conference next year will still be considerably exercised by the question of dismantling apartheid, whatever the actual state of affairs is then.

At one stage, when we were further away from what we hope will prove to be change, we thought, perhaps naively, that there would be one big turning point, that the day would come when the wall comes down as it were. We now realize that instead of one turning point, there is only a series of events, some of which have already started while others are far off. The sum of all these events is the change which will ensure the demise of apartheid.

Steering a course through the waters of change is a dangerous enterprise, as the alarming level of violence in South Africa demonstrates. The Nordic trade unions fully support the conclusions of the fact-finding mission of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which in early February called on the international community to intensify its assistance in countering violence and helping to guide South Africa through its first free elections.

Violence takes a heavy toll on South Africa in terms of human life. It is a major destabilizing factor and is exploited by those who resist democratization, including elements of the present security forces and of the Government itself. Violence ties up the resources of the trade unions and thus in more than one way impedes the necessary construction of a non-racial, democratic society and its labour market. This is why there is an urgent need to direct more assistance to COSATU and NACTU to counter this violence.

Since the Harare Conference, the last year's Conference which endorsed the Recommendations, we have operated on the assumption that there are two possible scenarios – the positive and the negative. The positive scenario is embodied by an ILO Plan of Action, the foundations of which have already been laid. In specific terms, the implementation of what will now become a more comprehensive plan has started with technical assistance to COSATU and NACTU and later to the tripartite bodies, and the follow-up to the recommendations of the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission of the ILO. The negative scenario, of course, is a situation of no change or deterioration, possibly with increasing violence.

I wish to conclude with some observations which refer again to the justified and grave concern about diminishing assistance from the world community in a critical period and the prospects of assistance in the future. Assistance does not only mean money. It means advice, concern, commitment and support in all their forms.

Others have referred to the "last mile" and so shall I. This last mile is proving to be rather longer than we may have thought, and it will be followed by other long and arduous miles. There is so much at stake in this transition, and we have already invested so much in it, that we must ensure that the necessary assistance is forthcoming.

We are not only eagerly waiting for something to end, we are impatiently waiting for something to begin and get under way. And the ILO and all its constituents – individually and in concert – must be part of that process.

Original Arabic: Mr. A. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – The Arab group, which is tripartite and includes governments, employers, workers and of which I am honoured to express the views on the report we are now discussing, would like to declare its deep satisfaction with the work of the Committee on Apartheid this year. The group would also like to express its thanks to the Committee's Chairman, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, and to the Committee's members for their distinguished efforts and especially for the serious and objective nature of their discussions and conclusions.

We in the Arab group fully support the continuation of the multilateral negotiations now taking place on the future of South Africa, but we hope that these negotiations will not become bogged down. At the same time we would like to express our profound concern regarding the violence and massacres which have cost the lives of thousands of black citizens, and we condemn those who instigated these massacres. We also condemn the continuation of the arrest and detention of a large number of people, including trade unionists and nationalist leaders, on the basis of trumped-up charges. We should note that only inconsequential changes have taken place in the practice of apartheid, that these changes are imperceptible in everyday life and there has been no change in the general social climate. Institutions of apartheid such as Bantustans and the parliament continue to exclude the native black population, and the social and economic legacy of apartheid still separates whites and blacks in South Africa. In all cases, we see that the developments in South Africa do not satisfy the conditions laid down by the General Assembly of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity. These are organizations whose resolutions and recommendations are particularly important to us. We insist especially on the need to release quickly all political prisoners, to allow the return of deportees and to allow national labour movements to work freely.

As for the report before us, we endorse all the conclusions in the 21 subparagraphs of paragraph 47 because the application of these recommendations is the least we can do in this transitional stage to expedite the dismantling of this vile apartheid system, which is based on exploitation and plunder.

We would like to reiterate our view that it is premature to suspend the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and the conclusions of the tripartite conference held in Harare in May 1992 or to consider the dismantling of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, because apartheid is still practised. We are also against the lifting of the arms embargo. We support the continuation of efforts made by the ILO, in cooperation with the international community, to contribute to the establishment of a society in South Africa based on democracy, equality, justice and stability. We also support an increase in the level of aid given by the Organization to national liberation movements.

The Arab group does not favour adopting an excessively optimistic view of the situation. We believe we should not lessen the pressure we are applying now that it has proven effective. We are awaiting with interest the conclusion of an agreement on the establishment of a Transitional Executive Council in the near future, and we welcome the proposal to hold elections next year. We would like these elections to be held under neutral, international supervision to ensure that they are fair, and we hope that every effort will be made to draft a new constitution guaranteeing equal rights for all citizens without discrimination.

The International Labour Organization, which has played a special role in dismantling apartheid in South Africa, will be called upon to aid and support the people and workers of South Africa in drafting new labour legislation in accordance with international labour standards and in reorganizing living and working conditions in many fields. Some of these will include job creation, labour administration, the reorganization of placement services, industrial relations, collective bargaining, productivity, training, the development of human resources, and workers' education.

The Arab group, in its tripartite composition, took a stand on this question as early as 1962, when the question of apartheid was for the first time placed on the agenda of the Conference. Our group is aware of the suffering of persecuted peoples in as much as it realizes the sufferings of the Palestine people. That is why we will always maintain our position in support of the struggles of these peoples until they achieve complete independence.

Mr. LARSEN (Government adviser and substitute delegate, Denmark) – I have the honour to take the floor on behalf of the European Community and its member States, in our debate today on the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

We would like first of all to congratulate the Director-General on another excellent Special Report on the Application of the Declaration of the Policy of Apartheid which we have read with interest. Let me, at this juncture, express the hope that it be one of the last reports.

The European Community and its member States have been eagerly following the democratic process in South Africa and maintained that the abolition of apartheid must be brought about peacefully. We continue to call on all parties to avoid violent action and have supported a curbing of the violence through the European Community observer mission in South Africa and by sending experts to cooperate with the Goldstone Commission. We are ready further to assist in any appropriate way to bring the present process to a peaceful conclusion. Although the process is still fragile we are confident that an interim arrangement in the form of a Transitional Executive Council could soon be established. Soon afterwards a democratically elected Assembly could draft a constitution. In this regard, we have taken note of the proposed date of 27 April 1994 for elections. In recognition of the fundamental changes which have taken place in South Africa in recent years, the European Community and its member States have lifted most of the restrictive measures they imposed in 1985 and 1986. Following his recent visit to South Africa acting as President of the European Commission, the Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs at the Council's meeting of Foreign Ministers on 8 June this year announced the Community's decision to lift the measures imposed by the Community once a Transitional Executive Council is in place. Furthermore, positive measures would be adjusted with a view to creating further incentives for the negotiation process. Among measures under consideration are the upgrading of the EC office in South Africa to a full EC delegation and the lifting of the restrictions on cooperation in the sphere of security. The European Community and its member States are also ready to enter into a dialogue on future EC-South Africa economic relations with a representative Transitional Executive Council. Furthermore, reporting under the code of conduct for European enterprises in South Africa will be discontinued.

Heads of EC missions will report annually on developments in the area of labour conditions, in particular, concerning equality of opportunities.

Let me finally add that the 12 EC Ministers for Overseas Development decided, on 25 May, that once a Transitional Executive Council was in place the European Community and its member States would launch a new development initiative and enter into dialogue with the Transitional Executive Council on development matters.

The role of the ILO in relation to a peaceful transition to full democracy in South Africa should not be underestimated. This has been made clear on several occasions and highlighted at the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare, which the European Community and its member States generally endorsed. We did, however, say that we regarded certain aspects of the updated Declaration and Programme of Action as obsolete. Given the relative progress in the negotiation process since then we would hope that the Declaration could be formally rescinded at the International Labour Conference in 1994.

With regard to the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid which this session of the Conference is asked to endorse, the European Community and its member States hold the view that these conclusions, along with statements and actions in other forums, send an important message to all parties involved in the negotiating process in South Africa. We must therefore be sure that we encourage this process indicating, on the one hand, the close monitoring by the international community of developments in South Africa but, on the other, also indicating our willingness to lift the remaining pressure as soon as a Transitional Executive Council is in place. With this in mind, we are in agreement with the conclusions in general, noting a more positive tone than previously.

We do, however, have reservations regarding some paragraphs in the conclusions and particularly the specific wording of paragraph 21. In our view, it is of the utmost importance that the International Labour Conference next year be in a position formally and finally to rescind the Declaration – given that the necessary conditions prevail – and not only reword the Declaration. We would have liked to see a more concise text to that effect.

Having said that, we endorse the report.

(Mr. Tabani takes the Chair.)

Mr. GRANTHAM (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom) – On behalf of the British Trades Union Congress, I wish to express our thanks to our excellent Chairman, Mr. Ejalu, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, and to our Reporter, Mr. Veltheim of Finland, for their work in leading the Committee on Action against Apartheid to a valuable report and one which we hope will be endorsed today.

We welcome the present political negotiations in South Africa and the agreement on a provisional date for elections next April. The withdrawal of the Inkatha Freedom Party (IKP) from those talks is a serious threat to stability and poses a danger that who those oppose free elections will take further steps to increase violence as a means of delaying or preventing those free elections. Such a development would be very serious. We call on the IKP and those other groups which have withdrawn from the political negotiations to return and show that they, too, accept that the only way forward is to hold democratic elections free from the threat of violence.

Our friends and colleagues in COSATU and NACTU are known to be targeted for attack by the forces which oppose transition to democracy. They have to change their living quarters regularly to prevent the assassins from finding them. We know a number of those who visited this session of the Conference this week fear that they may not live to see the outcome of free elections. Yet, the trade union movement is so well established and so representative in South Africa that these threats and dangers cannot halt the enormous pressure from trade unionists for progress towards a full democracy. We express our hope that the present constructive talks between COSATU and NACTU on a merger will come to fruition because a united trade union movement in South Africa will be an even more potent force for peace and democracy in the future.

All workers need proper democratic rights and the ability to organize and be represented. We call on the South African Government to repeal the Bantu Homeland Citizenship Act and to reincorporate the bantustans into South Africa so that their people can take part in next April's elections. Furthermore, we ask that the basic labour laws be extended to workers in bantustans and to the domestic and farm workers in South Africa and to workers in the public sector, all of whom are denied such rights at this point in time. To hold free elections that command worldwide respect, there must be an electoral commission and an independent media commission. In addition, the ILO must give urgent help to the trade unions and other democratic organizations in South Africa to enable them to provide education for their people on how to exercise the right to vote that most of them have never enjoyed in their lives.

The TUC was part of the ICFTU Fact-finding Commission to South Africa in February this year which concluded that the South African Government was directly or indirectly involved in the violence. This major danger to the peace process is why the ILO cannot withdraw or suspend the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid until there is clear evidence of irrevocable progress towards democracy and an end to the institutions of apartheid confirmed by the Transitional Executive Council which we hope to see appointed shortly and other democratic bodies in South Africa. Until that stage is reached, our work must be concentrated on pressure on the South African Government and other bodies to end the violence, to open to all people in South Africa the right to vote and to control the police and the armed forces and the other armed groups that have posed such a serious danger to the lives of ordinary people in South Africa in the past years.

When progress to democracy is irrevocable, there will be need for the plan of economic help and assistance referred to in conclusion 17 of the report. That help is needed to assist whole generations of workers in South Africa deprived of proper education, training and employment by the destructive policies followed under apartheid over so many years. In this spirit, the TUC wholly supports the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and calls for its unanimous adoption by the Conference.

Mr. DESSER (Government adviser, Austria) – Let me first of all congratulate the Director-General on his Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid. The Report assesses progress made in the democratic process and in relation to new forums of cooperation in the socio-economic field. Although the current situation is not fully stabilized, we have reason to hope that the establishment of a Transitional Executive Council and ultimately the elections foreseen for April 1994 will confirm the fundamental changes that have occurred in South Africa recently.

Austria has always supported these developments. We believe that the full commitment of all parties to the peaceful establishment of a multi-racial society guaranteeing equal rights for all is also the necessary basis for further improvements in the social and labour field.

In this context, we generally welcome the balanced conclusions in the report of the Committee on Apartheid. In particular, a reconsideration of the merits of the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa in light of current trends seems more than timely. We hope that the situation, namely the creation of a Transitional Executive Council and the holding of general elections, will make it possible to suspend or rescind the Declaration.

The action of the ILO in South Africa will however be of major importance: technical assistance can help the establishment of a democratic social partnership and improve the overall economic and social situation of the country.

Original French: Mrs. FAUCHERE (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – The World Confederation of Labour would first like to congratulate the Committee on its excellent work. The WCL was also very happy to learn that an agreement was reached on 1 June between the 26 members of the forum responsible for negotiation on the country's political future concerning the holding of free elections on 27 April 1994.

Nevertheless, the WCL strongly recommends caution to all parties concerned – trade unions, NGOs, the ILO and the international community – vis-à-vis the Pretoria regime and in particular the extremist groups which are doing their utmost to sabotage the negotiations and halt the transition to political and constitutional reform in the country.

Under these circumstances, the World Confederation of Labour reaffirms its determination and its commitment to proceed with its action until such time as discriminatory practices of all kinds disappear in South Africa. As confirmed during a recent mission to South Africa, it will seek, in cooperation with other social forces, to ensure that the pace of legislative, administrative and other measures is speeded up so that a policy providing for equality of treatment at all levels, particularly in the fields of employment, education, health and housing, is implemented for all, irrespective of race, creed or sex.

Despite the repeal of the legislation that bolstered apartheid, the WCL notes with dismay that certain discriminatory laws are still in force and that wide disparities still exist in South Africa. In the case of labour legislation, workers in many sectors are still being discriminated against because the Ministry of Labour has reserved special powers for itself, particularly as regards collective bargaining and the fixing of wages and salaries.

Apart from the transition to democracy in South Africa, the WCL reaffirms its support for the establishment of a constituent and sovereign assembly and an interim government and for the negotiations between representative organizations in the country with a view to building a post-apartheid society based on democracy, peace and social justice.

The WCL also calls for the release of all political prisoners, the repeal of all repressive and discriminatory legislation, the extension of the Labour Relations Act to all workers and the disbanding of the special forces.

The WCL urges all international organizations, and in particular the ILO, to take steps to support the democratic trade unions and the liberation movements in the implementation of their training and education policies so as to ensure that young people and women in particular have access to the labour market.

Considering that the majority of the population of South Africa has never voted, the WCL supports all initiatives taken by international organizations, especially the ILO, to carry out essential educational work among the electorate. The majority of the people of South Africa will then be able to opt with greater facility for a new democratic South Africa, which can take its legitimate place among the free nations of the world.

Lastly, the WCL calls upon the Conference to adopt the report and the conclusions of the Committee.

Mr. LESCAULT (Workers' adviser, United States) – Thank you for your indulgence in allowing me to speak from the floor. I apologize to my colleagues for not rising to the podium. I would humbly ask the ILO, however, to install a secured handrailing at a minimum or access to the podium without stairs to assist those of us with a mobility deficiency.

Having dispensed with my personal plea, I would like to address the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, on behalf of the Workers' delegates from the United States and our organization, the AFL-CIO. For reasons that I will shortly explain, we are prepared and eager to go beyond a simple endorsement of this document and to go beyond offering our perfunctory support. We are poised to pursue actively the goals outlined in the report of the Committee.

We would like to remind the Conference that three years ago Nelson Mandela ushered in a period of euphoria and high expectations for some at the Conference, and caution for others. In those years, 1990, 1991 and 1992 the Committee on Action against Apartheid heatedly argued the merits of punitive measures aimed at the Government of South Africa. Today we have before us a document that does not call for new punitive measures, but rather positive programmes that reflect today's needs to satisfy tomorrow's objective. That objective is a free and fair election that will once and for all end the political policy of apartheid and begin the era of building a non-racial equitable and unitary democratic and peaceful South Africa. To accomplish that objective, the international community cannot wait to act until the elections are completed. The period between now and 27 April 1994 is a mere ten months. The task is daunting. For the tripartite social partners inside South Africa, our support, our encouragement and our advice are essential for the critical negotiations that will determine not only the parameters of the election but also the governance of the country leading to that election. For this reason we are extremely disappointed with the walk-out three days ago and support all efforts to keep the negotiating partners at the table.

The international community must take a more vigorous posture, a more activist approach to combat the violence that is plaguing that country. While we can sit here today and congratulate ourselves on the absence of new punitive measures in the report, we would be hard pressed to find an unemployed South African squatter family, or victim of this violence to share our self-congratulatory sentiments. Eradicating violence through monitoring, exposure, conflict resolution and conflict awareness are essential elements and create an atmosphere conducive to free and fair elections. The eradication of violence is also essential to the future of South Africa.

Those who believe that investors are going to flood South Africa the day after elections had better look at the historic trend of the business community's aversion to volatile situations. Those who believe that the election will be the clarion call to end violence in South Africa had better look at the post-election collision course between the euphoria of the victors and the despair of the losers, particularly in a highly charged election.

It is our responsibility today to commit ourselves to ending the violence immediately. We cannot wait until the voter registration process begins and have the terms of registration dictated by violence. We cannot wait until the election and then have the election results determined by violence. We cannot wait until after the election and have a new South Africa enter the stage on a violent note.

We must begin today. Our active support for the South African trade union movement and the other non-racial democratic forces is more critical today than at any other period in this long battle to end apartheid.

We tend to dwell on the immediate gratification of political change in South Africa. We cannot forget the overriding importance of building a strong and enduring foundation to voter education and awareness. We cannot forget the economic struggles that are being waged on the shop-floor as we speak today. We cannot forget the social imperatives that must be addressed to the broadest range of issues from education and housing to employment creation and affirmative action. We cannot forget the hundreds of thousands of workers, farm and domestic workers, those in the public sector, who are not covered by labour legislation. All these areas and others demand our immediate attention.

It is not a matter of paternalism or neo-colonialism. It is a collective response to a problem that goes beyond the borders of South Africa, and beyond the continent of Africa. South Africa is on the threshold of a new era. A new era means change, the opportunity to redress wrongs and more importantly the opportunity to create better, to improve upon existing models and systems. For all of us it is an opportunity to see change, learn from it, and improve our own lives. There is an adage that says "you are either a part of the problem or part of the solution".

I am pleased to report to the Conference that our organization, the AFL-CIO, and our centre for Africa, the AALC, are part of the solution. Earlier I mentioned that we are poised to pursue the goals of the report. While this is true, it would be more accurate to omit the word "poise" and say we are actively pursuing these goals.

Along with the ICFTU and other members of the international labour community, we are investigating and monitoring violence as it pertains to trade union members and other workers. We are promoting voter education to the trade union centres, COSATU and NACTU. We are supporting trade union programmes through both federations and their affiliates. We are involved in conferences that address the social and economic issues that need to be solved if this exercise of democracy is going to take root, and we have initiated a vocational training programme with the construction unions to improve the skill levels for a new South Africa.

This is not a job solely for a handful of international labour groups. This is a job for all of us. Our commitment, our resources and our expertise must be laid on the doorstep of South Africa to be freely used by South Africans in the best interests of South Africans.

This is the message of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. While the success or failure of this great effort in South Africa is in the hands completely of South Africans, we hope there will never be a day when we look back and say we should have done more.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – I thank Mr. Lescault, Workers' representative, United States, for his valuable contribution. I have no doubt, Mr. Lescault, that your proposal which was unanimously endorsed by all the delegates present, will result in positive action by the International Labour Organization.

But on a more personal note, I thoroughly enjoyed your speech, because for a change, I heard the speaker face-to-face.

Mr. WOJCIK (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Poland) – Allow me first to associate myself with the previous speakers in congratulating Mr. Abdel-Hak on his election to the presidency of the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. It is a great privilege for me to convey my profound gratitude to the members of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for presenting a very comprehensive and significant report on apartheid. I am pleased to express our support for the Committee's proposed conclusions.

Within the trade union Solidarnosc, of which I am a national elected officer, we have discussed the fight against apartheid in great detail and have been involved in it to the fullest possible extent. On the political level, Solidarnosc recognized the establishment by the Polish Government of diplomatic, consular and trade relations with South Africa as premature. However, once it became an accomplished fact, our trade union expressed the view that, while maintaining its relations with South Africa, the Polish Government should strictly comply with sanctions adopted by the United Nations Security Council. Consequently, further relations with the South African Government ought to be based upon the principle of proportionality, that is, they should be improved and advanced in proportion to genuine and tangible progress in dismantling the system of apartheid.

We also urge the Polish Government regularly to make information available on emerging trade links with South Africa. Our claims to that end stem from the fact that the National Statistical Bureau is unable to report adequately on the Polish companies, if any, which have trade contacts with South African counterparts.

The trade union Solidarnosc continuously supports the actions by COSATU and NACTU, both at home and abroad, by issuing statements and launching national campaigns. By way of example, information on apartheid and its effects on industrial relations constitutes an integral part of several trade union training courses. We emphasize in our actions the similarity of the struggle by the ANC for democracy and human rights with that waged for years by Solidarnosc against the Polish Communist regime. As an affiliate of the ICFTU and the WCL, Solidarnosc strongly supports the activities of both Confederations against apartheid.

Furthermore, Solidarnosc repeatedly uses its media resources to discourage Polish labour emigration to South Africa, although most recent figures appear to show a decreasing trend in such emigration. This effect may partly be attributed to the campaign launched years ago by Solidarnosc, but also to the increasing unrest in South Africa. Our campaigns are based on the conviction that, although each worker has a right to choose whether and where to emigrate, he or she needs to be aware that emigration to South Africa reduces job opportunities for black workers.

We would like to confirm our profound commitment to the peaceful and non-violent methods of struggle for a non-racial and democratic South Africa, as we ourselves used in our struggle for freedom against an autocratic system of governance. We, therefore, strongly separate ourselves from any violent acts against leaders and activists of the African National Congress, like that of the murder of Mr. Chris Hani.

We believe that the South African workers and people will further strengthen their unity and overcome the hardships and obstacles on their way forward to the final elimination of the evil apartheid system.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL AMERI (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – Once again, and for more than 20 years now, we are demanding that oppression be lifted from the people of South Africa and that they be treated on an equal footing, without any considerations of colour of skin.

South Africa is endowed with everything in order to avoid the crises that constantly plague other countries in Africa. And yet it is faced with unemployment, especially in the cities and townships. Industrial relationships give rise to concern. The trade unions are repressed and political violence is an everyday occurrence in the industrial areas, in spite of the efforts of trade unions such as COSATU, and its appeals for peace. It is indeed extremely regrettable that violence should prevail and cause so many victims among the black inhabitants.

This state of affairs can only be terminated through international solidarity and pressure on the Pretoria Government, and through an embargo on apartheid structures. If we don't maintain pressure on South Africa, we will be encouraging all the racists throughout the world and promoting waves of violence which will be difficult to repress.

The immigrants in Europe and in other countries are victims of this situation; their economic and social rights are trampled upon. In Bosnia-Herzegovina entire towns are destroyed as the world merely watches what is being called "ethnic cleansing". In Somalia men, women, children and old people are gunned down as part of a so-called humanitarian intervention. All this comes down to discrimination, a lack of justice and a lack of respect for human values.

Our Confederation has always taken firm stands against racism and discrimination in our Arab region. Many of our workers are victims of discrimination which is not in any way different from that facing the workers of South Africa. Their rights are violated by foreigners, and they are expelled from their motherland. Once again we give our unconditional support to the demands of the black people and workers of South Africa, calling for an end to apartheid and peace, equality and justice in that country.

We request the international community to maintain its pressure on Pretoria and to continue the embargo until that Government submits to the demands of the international community, repeals all discriminatory legislation and treats all inhabitants of the country on an equal footing. We hope that the International Labour Organization will continue to play its role according to its Constitution, and that it will give full support to the workers of South Africa, and to COSATU, in particular.

The International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions supports the report and the conclusions, which define the role of our Organization as regards the rights of the workers and the issue of employment, with a view to improving the working conditions, safety and employment. Finally, we reaffirm our solidarity with the people of South Africa and their trade union organizations. We are their faithful and sincere friends and we will give them full support.

Original French: Mr. NIASSE (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Senegal) – Allow me, on behalf of the Worker members of the delegation of Senegal, to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

As you know, Senegal is one of the first African countries to provide a tangible support to the struggle against apartheid for the emancipation of the vast black majority and the implementation of democracy in a multi-racial society in South Africa.

This support, as everyone knows, took the form of raising the representation of the ANC to that of an embassy and through this embassy of ensuring a broad dissemination of anti-apartheid propagation.

We will all recall the term of office of President Abdou Diouf, President of the Republic of Senegal, as head of the Organization of African Unity in 1986 during which term, despite the inherent risks involved, President Diouf visited all the Front-line States and flew over South African territory at a time when there was no guarantee of security and safety.

For all these reasons and for many others as well, my delegation approves and endorses the comprehensive Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. My delegation wishes to take this opportunity of congratulating Mr.

Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for his courageous action and contribution to the eradication of apartheid.

Nevertheless, my delegation would, together with all those of good will throughout the world, like to emphasize that there are still very alarming events taking place in South Africa. For my delegation apartheid is far from having been abolished. Violence continues and is having negative effects on the negotiations of CODESA and tending to delay progress towards the creation of a non-racial society. The actions of extremists such as the Boipatong massacre on 17 June 1992, the events of 7 September 1992 when the security forces of Ciskei opened fire on the demonstrators and killed 29 persons, the murder of Chris Hani – all these events and the difficulties of the Government of South Africa in controlling matters are leading the country to an economic situation described in the Report of the Director-General, where he underscores the fact that the capital account of the balance of payments is still very vulnerable, since funds are still continuing to leave South Africa for the eighth successive year, depriving the country of at least R40 billion since 1985.

According to the same Report of the Director-General, the international financial community demonstrated its dissatisfaction vis-à-vis South Africa by applying punitive interest rates which exceeded the level of the London inter-bank offered rate by 1.5 percentage points in the first six months of 1992 and by 3 points after the massacres of Boipatong and Bisho.

Contrary to the aims of the right-wing extremists, who are attempting to retain privileges for the white race by perpetrating acts of terrorism, this situation to which we have referred leads to negative growth rates for the South African economy and will therefore have repercussions on all sectors, but particularly on employment. The South African Chamber of Business (SACOB) reported that the number of jobs lost in the fourth quarter of 1992 was 85,000 for the private sector and 5,790 in the public sector which proves, if proof is still required, that violence can have only adverse effects upon the economy of a country.

As the report states, 42 per cent of the population lived in a state of poverty in 1990, that is to say below the basic minimum level and this was a general figure. But the reality in the rural areas is much harsher since there 82.6 per cent of the black population were living in a state of poverty.

Even the whites were not spared from this situation and there was a drop in their real income between the years 1985 and 1990.

This generalized economic recession is the result of serious political violence which is a daily occurrence in the black townships. According to the report, in September 1992, the Government committed itself to progressively eliminating immigrant centres which are the cause of massacres such as those in Boipatong. Despite these promises some sectors are continuing to encourage violence by recruiting into their security forces members of Koevoet whose past involvement in the war against the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) in Namibia needs no comment.

My delegation is as firmly convinced of the need to eradicate apartheid as is the great majority of the white population of South Africa which, in its referendum on 17 March 1992, clearly showed that it was in favour of a process of reform already initiated by the Government of South Africa and of guiding the country towards a democratic and multi-racial society.

In this respect, the haste with which some governments are establishing diplomatic and trade relations will not contribute positively to a solution to the situation of conflict in South Africa.

My delegation feels that the ILO, now more than ever, should study the measures to be taken to ensure respect of the positions set forth in the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

It should also establish contact with governments in relation to the suspension of political, diplomatic, military, cultural and sporting relations with the Government of South Africa, the refusal to recognize the bantustans, the refusal to allow the opening of representation offices and the entry of representatives of the bantustans in the different countries of the world, and should ensure the full implementation and respect of the embargo.

These measures, in addition to those recommended in the conclusions of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, will, we are convinced, lead the Government and all the progressive forces in South Africa to a situation of greater calm, providing for the necessary transition towards the establishment of a multi-racial and democratic society.

My delegation, whilst approving the conclusions of the report of the Committee, wishes to highlight conclusion 4 which calls upon the ILO to urge the South African Government and all parties concerned to cooperate in combating violence and to exercise restraint. The conclusion also stresses the need to strengthen the mechanism set up by the tripartite constituents of the National Peace Accord of September 1992, to curb the violence still prevailing and calls for the maintenance of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa until 27 April 1994.

In conclusion, the delegation of Senegal supports the efforts made by CODESA to fix a date for the elections and congratulates all parties of CODESA for their understanding and their commitment to a lasting peace in South Africa and the creation of a multi-racial and democratic society.

Mr. SALMENPERA (Government delegate, Finland, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries*)* – I have the honour to make this statement on behalf of the Governments of the five Nordic countries Denmark, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and my own country Finland.

The Nordic Governments have manifested their deep revulsion and disapproval of apartheid ever since it was established in the Republic of South Africa as an institutionalized system of racial discrimination.

In accordance with the Nordic Plan of Action against Apartheid, the Nordic countries have implemented actively and vigorously different sanctions and measures to combat this system. As the guardian of social justice and equity on the global level, the International Labour Office, together with other bodies of the United Nations system, has been playing an important role in the elimination and eradication of this practice unworthy of the human community. The Nordic Governments wish to pay tribute to this action. Our task now is to make an accurate evaluation of the present situation and draw the right conclusions for the future action of our Organization.

Over the past three years, we have witnessed considerable political progress in South Africa. The beginning of serious discussions between the Government of South Africa and the most important organizations representing the black majority in 1991, a referendum among the white workers in March 1992 and the recent announcement that the first free elections in the country would be held on 27 April 1994 are milestones in the process that we all support.

These changes have been duly noted by the international community and have been reflected in debates in the international forums. Last year the General Assembly of the United Nations approved by consensus a resolution which it, inter alia, welcomed the overall progress in the dismantling of apartheid through peaceful means and noted the repeal of major laws which have constituted the pillars of apartheid. It also appealed to the international community to support this vulnerable and critical process still under way in South Africa by the application of appropriate measures by the South African authorities. This is our political position also.

Recent developments have unfortunately not been as smooth as we had hoped. An example of this is political violence, which in 1992 led to dramatic killings in Boipatong and, most recently, to the assassination of the black African leader, Chris Hani.

As the Nordic Governments have stated on previous occasions, it is the responsibility of the South African Government to ensure the protection of lives and property of all its citizens. At the same time all parties are responsible for effective implementation of the national peace accord. We therefore urge all parties again to show maximum restraint in this delicate period of transition and to commit themselves to a process of peaceful change. We hope this will lead rapidly to the creation of the Transitional Executive Council and confirmation of election date of 27 April 1994.

In our view the ILO should, and could, be an active player in the overall process of change within South Africa, particularly in providing information to the social partners participating in the national economic forum and assisting the extensive programme of labour law reform which is under way in South Africa.

We welcome the programme of workshops which has already started and consider further work, inter alia in the fields of occupational safety and health in the mining industry, human resources development and employment and income policy, to be extremely useful.

We also support the future plan of action outlined in the present conclusions of the Apartheid Committee, and which is to be implemented after the Transitional Executive Council is established.

The Nordic Governments also feel that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, amended in 1988, no longer reflects accurately the policy that is needed in this situation. The Declaration has become in many places obsolete and, if the process of democratization continues as we hope, it should be thoroughly reviewed at the next session of the International Labour Conference and possibly even rescinded, if the necessary conditions prevail.

Original Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government adviser and substitute delegate, China) – The Chinese delegation supports the Report and the Conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. At present, developments in South Africa are at a critical juncture. On the one hand, people have seen the dawn of the end of apartheid, and on the other the democratic process is still meeting with resistance from certain political and social forces. The purpose of our deliberations at this session is to send an unequivocal message that the international community firmly supports the South African people in their struggle to eradicate apartheid and speed up the process towards a political solution. The Government of China and its people have always been concerned at the developments in southern Africa. We are against the apartheid system in South Africa and firmly support the South African people in their struggle for racial equality and basic human rights.

Thanks to the protracted struggle of the South African people, the past two years have seen some positive measures taken by the Government of South African, and the realization of multiparty constitutional talks whereby the parties concerned sat down together to look at ways to settle the question of South Africa. This is an important step in a democratic process. China welcomes the positive changes in South Africa in the past few years, and supports the various political forces in that country in their search for a peaceful solution through negotiation. We believe that since, under the current circumstances, there is still a long way to go to eliminate apartheid and its serious consequences and that the racist forces are still attempting to stop and undermine this process, the international community should keep up the necessary pressure and urge the Government of South Africa to take practical steps to speed up the political settlements of the South African question by removing all obstacles to it.

It should be pointed out that a political settlement is by no means smooth sailing. The parties concerned should be fully aware of this and continue to make the necessary efforts. We call for an immediate end to all kinds of terrorism and hope that the present peace process in South Africa will continue its momentum. To this end, the Government of South Africa should accept the responsibility for stopping violence and creating the necessary atmosphere and conditions for the restoration of the peace process so as to bring about an early settlement of the question.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-SABBAH (representative of Palestine) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The continuing policy and the concept of apartheid and of racial discrimination, and the persistence of entities which practise this policy and apply those concepts in South Africa and in occupied Palestine, are embodied in two regimes which are similar in idealogy and practice. These practices also constitute a flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and are a permanent source of tension and conflict which poison international relations, prevent the establishment of sound relations between nations and people, and sow seeds of hatred between peoples. On this occasion, and given the heritage of suffering common to the peoples of Africa and Palestine, we extend our greeting to the peoples of Africa, who through their struggle and with the support of the international community, have managed to remove the regimes of racial discrimination in Zimbabwe (formerly Rhodesia) and in Namibia. We extend our particular greetings to the ANC, which is leading the struggle of the South African people to end the policy of apartheid practised by the South African regime. We emphasize that international support must continue to be given to the ANC and that the blockade must be strengthened against the apartheid regime to deprive it of any room for manoeuvre in its attempts to keep itself in power contrary to the interests, the objectives and national aspirations of the South African people.

The people of Palestine have suffered enormously as a result of the policies practised by the Israeli entity, just as the people of South Africa have suffered as a result of the policies of the South African regime. These sufferings and struggles have united the two peoples in their confrontation with those two entities, which are both characterized by a policy of colonization embodied in the practice of appropriating land and in their resort to various forms of discrimination, violence and terrorism against the lawful owners of that land, practices which confirm the racist character of colonialist regimes inspired by a racist ideology.

The relationship between the two regimes date back to 1902, when the founder of the Zionist movement, Theodor Herzl, wrote to Cecil Rhodes telling him that he was the only man who could help him. The friendship continued between Herzl's successor, Chaim Weizman, and the South African Prime Minister, General Smuts. After the Zionists named a place after the General, he sent them a letter of thanks, stating that his work in favour of Zionism had from the very beginning been an act of love and thanks. The relationship continued. Dr. Vorster became Prime Minister of South Africa. It was he who said in 1942: "We believe in Christian nationalism allied with socialism; this nationalism is called fascism in Italy, Nazism in Germany and Christian nationalism in South Africa". When Malan became Prime Minister in 1948 South Africa recognized the Government of Israel, and the two regimes subsequently took an openly hostile position not only vis-à-vis the peoples of the region but also against all human values. Relations between the two involved all domains of political, economic and military life, not to mention the nuclear field and the exchange of know-how and expertise. The cooperation between the South African and Israeli regimes in the exchange of expertise and experience extends even to the methods used in the repression of the Palestinian and African peoples in their struggle for their right to life in accordance with the Declaration of Human Rights, the requirements of national sovereignty and the principles of international law. The two regimes have exchanged expertise and experience in dealing with the States in their respective regions. Thus, the South African regime has perpetrated repeated attacks against neighbouring African States and occupied parts of their territory with the assistance of certain friendly regimes to whom they have provided help and support. The same policy has been pursued by Israel against the Arab States, and has led to repeated outbreaks of war (in 1956, 1967, 1978, 1982, etc). As well as Palestinian land, Israel occupied other Arab territories in the Golan and Sinai in 1967. In southern Lebanon, it appealed for help from the militia of Saad Haddad to reinforce its occupation, and has provided help and support to that militia, following the example of the South African regime.

Both regimes have played the same role in inciting unrest and generating instability in order to adversely affect economic and social development. For this reason, African and Arab States have been obliged to concentrate their efforts on defending their sovereignty and their borders, to the detriment of development and advancement in other aspects of life.

What is happening at present in the occupied Palestinian territories, where a full-scale blockage is being imposed on more than 2 million people, where Palestinians are subjected to ill treatment and terrorist practices, and where the crime of murder is committed in broad daylight, confirms yet again that violence and oppression are the means most favoured by racist regimes for exerting control over their subjects. A terrorist policy is being pursued against the people of South Africa and the Palestinian people, who are suffering under twin regimes, whose very similarity bears witness to a close and coordinated relationship. We are fully aware that the massacre of Kafr Qasem perpetrated by the Zionists against the Palestinian people in 1956 was repeated in 1960 in what became known as the Sharpeville massacre and that the assassination of the Palestinian leader Abu Jihad in 1987 at the hands of Zionism was repeated in 1993 with the assassination of the African national leader Chris Hani by South African racists.

The Palestinian people, who are struggling to enforce their right to return and to self-determination and to build an independent State with its capital in Jerusalem under the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization, their sole legitimate representative, are fully aware of the meaning of racism and of its manifestations in their daily lives in the form of oppression, terrorism and discrimination perpetrated by the Israeli occupation forces in the occupied territories. They are also aware that their uprooting and expulsion from their land were due to the support given by the imperialist countries to the racist and fascist Zionist movement. Aware of the dangers for world peace inherent in the survival and persistence of racist regimes, we wish to stress the need for the international community to take a decisive stand against those regimes and for certain major powers, who unfortunately continue to pursue a foreign policy governed by the law of the jungle, to refrain from supporting such regimes so that they may in turn be prevented from continuing to pursue their policies of repression and racial discrimination. In this way the international community would be reaffirming the right of peoples suffering under such policies, in particular the people of South Africa and the Palestinian people, to a decent life in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of national sovereignty.

In the post cold-war period we are looking forward to a new world in the true sense of the word, a world where justice and equality would prevail, a world where everybody is equal in the eyes of resolutions providing for international legitimacy and where everybody would contribute towards protection and development. We would like to emphasize this point because we are aware of the dangers of double standards with regard to international legitimacy and two sets of rules when dealing with certain problems, particularly the unjust blockade against the Iraqi people and the Libyan people and the indifference shown towards the non-implementation of resolutions concerning international legitimacy against Israel. The continuation of such policies might just give rise to a more widespread policy of racial discrimination instead of preventing it, and turn it into a standard way of conducting relations between States – policies which may lead us to the brink, to the law of the jungle, and which runs contrary to all the noble values for which mankind has made great sacrifices.

I would like to express the support of the Palestinian people for the people of South Africa. Victory is always on the side of those who fight for it.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: DISCUSSION (concl.) and adoption

The PRESIDENT (Mr. GRAY) – We resume our discussion on the Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Original Chinese: Mr. FU (Workers' adviser, China) – The report submitted to the Conference by the Committee on Action against Apartheid is a good document which has both taken note of the changes that have occurred in South Africa and reflected the present state of the South African people's struggle against racism. It is my sincere hope that all parties will, in accordance with the report, continue to exert pressure on the South African Government so as to oblige it to abandon apartheid at an early date. We are pleased to see the new progress over the past year in the South African people's struggle against racism. Last April multi-party constitutional discussions were resumed, the first since the breakdown of CODESA last year. The outcome of the talks signifies that the peace process in South Africa has entered a new stage, moving from procedural matters to substantive issues of drafting a new Constitution. However, we cannot lose sight of the fact that over the past year a series of violent incidents have happened in which innocent people have been killed, including the assassination of Mr. Chris Hani, General Secretary of the South African Communist Party. Indeed, his assassination has cast a shadow over the process of political settlement of the South African question and caused serious concern among the international community.

Chinese workers and trade unions have all along opposed and condemned any form of terrorism. We strongly condemn any violence undermining the democratic process in South Africa and support all the efforts made by the United Nations Secretary-General to stop the violent conflicts there. We hope that the parties concerned in South Africa will exercise restraint, resolve their differences through talks and avoid recurrence or escalation of violence so that the peace process can proceed smoothly and the goal of establishing a unified, democratic, non-racial new South Africa will be attained at an early date.

Chinese workers and trade unions have all along supported and sympathized with the South African people in their struggle against apartheid. We have all along been concerned with the development of the situation there. We supported the idea that the political settlement of the South African question should be sought through negotiation. It is our sincere hope that the South African Government will honour its commitments by taking practical and effective measures to ensure that the constitutional talks can proceed on the basis of equality and trust, and will remove all obstacles to the talks so that a new Constitution based on racial equality can be formulated at an early date and the notorious apartheid eradicated.

The democratic process in South Africa is now at a crossroads. The international community must continue to play its role by maintaining the pressure and urging the South African Government to take practical and positive steps to speed up the settlement of the problem, although there will still be some twists and turns on the way ahead and some setbacks before we arrive at a situation without racism. It is our firm conviction that the future is bright as long as the South African people of various ethnic backgrounds are united and persevere in their struggle for a unified, democratic, non-racial new South Africa that is in the interest of the South African people and will surely arise on the African continent at an early date.

Original French: Mr. ALDER (Government adviser, Switzerland) – My delegation has carefully read the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

Switzerland has unequivocally condemned racial discrimination and segregation, which are obviously incompatible with its democratic and humanitarian traditions. This position has, on many occasions, been brought to the attention of the South African authorities with all necessary clarity. My delegation remains convinced that only through negotiations will it be possible to establish a peaceful, democratic and non-racial South Africa.

My Government can endorse the conclusions contained in the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. Switzerland welcomes in particular the resumption of multi-party negotiations and the agreement amongst the various parties to hold free and democratic elections for a constituent assembly in South Africa on 27 April 1994. This prospect, however, should not hide the sad fact that thousands of people have lost their lives in a climate of political violence. Switzerland deeply deplores this situation and associates itself with the appeal launched by the international community to all parties concerned, asking them to curb the violence and to strengthen the machinery which was set up under the national peace agreement of 14 September 1991.

It is clear that the current process of political reforms must be accompanied by economic and social restructuring. Therefore, it is desirable for our Organization to take into account progress which has been achieved in eliminating apartheid, and to provide adequate support for the social partners.

At a time when it appears that certain aspects highlighted in the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid correspond less and less to current realities in South Africa, my delegation is in favour of re-examining ILO activities against apartheid. Switzerland believes, in fact, that we must not close our eyes to the changes which have taken place.

Original Farsi: Mr. MOHAMMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is almost four decades now since the issue of the racist policies of the South African regime was first examined by various United Nations bodies, including the ILO, as a specialized agency of the United Nations. The indefatigable attempts of the International Labour Conference have led to numerous resolutions and recommendations, all reflecting a total condemnation of the inhumane and discriminatory system of apartheid.

My delegation would like to express its appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for his comprehensive Report and his efforts with regard to the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. According to this Report, some developments have occurred in the transition from apartheid to democracy in South Africa in the course of last year. Negotiations with non-governmental organizations in general, and workers' and employers' organizations in particular, multilateral negotiations to tackle key socio-economic issues ranging from economic and labour relations to housing, electricity and local governments are examples of these developments.

Although the Government and the ANC have announced that they both favour some kind of coalition government for a period of five to ten years, many issues remain unresolved, including the precise extent of the distribution of power between the central and regional authorities, the guiding principles for drafting the Constitution and income distribution.

Contrary to the proposed amendments to the Labour Relations Act, the pressure on and repression of trade unions is continuing, union offices are raided by police, numerous clashes occur between union members, vigilantes and the police during which workers have been shot dead.

Employers' leaders of 200 organizations have taken the initiative to unite under a single body as a step towards gaining international recognition and membership in the International Organization of Employers and are becoming increasingly involved in the political process under way to reach an agreement on a non-racial and democratic Constitution.

Alongside the above-mentioned efforts, large-scale political violence in the black townships of the industrial areas as well as discriminatory policies in South Africa and the instability of the economic and political system have weakened the peaceful trend towards the eradication of apartheid. Political developments have not brought much change in the social and labour fields. The number of workers who have been killed and wounded had risen to an alarming level.

Although positive developments in South Africa should be acknowledged, they are still not adequate. The Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran firmly believes that the accelerated process of the dismantling of the apartheid system in South Africa should be accompanied by the release of all political prisoners, the lifting of all restriction and repression, the removal of the complete ban on all anti-apartheid political groups and the discontinuation of the present racial discriminatory policies.

All apartheid instruments have to be abolished and the basic, national, political and human rights of all South Africans, regardless of colour or race, must be guaranteed. National elections on the basis of one person one vote must be held and a popular government must be established through free elections.

We urge the international community to maintain sanctions on Pretoria as the main instrument to reach these ends.

In accordance with the implementation of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, adopted at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, and all other resolutions against the racist policies of South Africa adopted within the United Nations system, the Islamic Republic of Iran continues its political, cultural, economic and sport sanctions against the South African regime and maintains close cooperation with the intergovernmental group which monitors the supply and shipping of oil and petroleum products to that country.

My delegation also strives to strengthen and guarantee the implementation of the ban on the sale and shipment of oil and other oil products and has made it compulsory upon the purchasers of its oil by requesting discharge certificates.

It is incumbent on every one of us to support the struggle of the South African people for the total eradication of the apartheid system and the establishment of a country in which all people enjoy equal citizenship rights and which seeks to improve the social and economic infrastructure of the country, especially for the majority of black people.

The Islamic Republic of Iran firmly believes that the discriminatory system of apartheid can be dismantled only through the unified and comprehensive efforts of all members of the international community. We are ready to play our role in this regard fully and enthusiastically.

Mr. NAYDOU (representative of the African National Congress) – South Africa is one step away from democracy. On 27 April we will hold our first democratic elections. We in South Africa are facing one of the most dangerous periods in our history, as the last remaining vestiges of apartheid desperately try to protect and perpetuate the legacy of apartheid.

The ILO has a rich and proud tradition. It has fought consistently against apartheid; moreover, it is a central institution which promotes fair labour standards.

The system of apartheid in South Africa has perpetuated mass poverty amongst millions of our people. It has ensured a supply of cheap labour and has controlled the costs and allocation of black labour. Though we are confident that we will triumph against economic apartheid, we believe that this struggle will take several generations.

We have some of the greatest wealth inequalities in the world, with the majority of black people having no access to decent housing, proper health care, education and training. The minority of whites in South Africa, on the other hand, enjoy some of the highest standard of living in the entire world. We believe that in order to rid ourselves of apartheid we have to address the basic needs of the majority of our people.

Democracy in South Africa should mean more than just a vote. The ILO has a historic mission to ensure that there is no change in the date of the election, and to guarantee a free and fair election.

At the economic level, there are scores of negotiations taking place around the socio-economic reconstruction of our country. The conclusion adopted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid calls on the ILO to carry out a programme of technical assistance that allows the democratic forces in our country and our people to address the legacy of apartheid.

The negotiations that are presently taking place in the National Manpower Commission and in forums dealing with electrification, housing, local government, education and training, are priorities in a country where 42 per cent of the workforce is unemployed. We must create jobs, ensure that we have proper education and training, and ensure that we consolidate the labour legislation affecting millions of workers, in particular in reference to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission report.

We believe that the planning should start immediately, and that a specialized task force should be sent to South Africa, in consultation with the democratic trade union movement and in consultation with the various forums that have been set up to ensure a smooth transition to democracy.

We believe that technical assistance must be implemented as soon as we reach agreement on the Transitional Executive Committee and a multi-party structure that will be responsible for the transition to democracy. Such a structure would be set up within a matter of weeks.

The ANC and COSATU have also called for sanctions to be lifted when agreement is reached on the Transitional Executive Committee. We therefore believe that the ILO needs to implement urgently a programme of action to assist the democratization effort of the forces that have always worked for democracy in South Africa.

You have been called, ILO, to carry through a historic mission. You are the most important tripartite organization in the world, and for us to be confident that we will have democracy that has a real meaning in the lives of millions of people, we call upon the ILO to offer the assistance requested by the democratic forces of our country. We are confident that with that assistance, we will be able to take our place in the community of civilized nations at the next session of the Conference.

Original Arabic: Mr. GHETASSI (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! We would like first of all to pay tribute to Mr. Abdel Hak and to congratulate him once more for having been elected President of this session of the Conference. We wish him full success in the task he is to perform. We would also like to thank the Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and all those who worked for the Committee or took part in its work for their efforts, which have produced the final report submitted to the Conference.

Since the Islamic revolution of 1979 led by Imam Khomeni, may he rest in peace, the Iranian people, including the workers, have undertaken to act against the Pretoria Government. We broke off relations with the racist South African Government, and we imposed an embargo on the export of oil to the country. All oil tankers heading for South Africa were brought back to Iran.

We believe man's happiness in society is a noble objective. Independence and dignity are indispensable elements of a system based on the rule of law and justice for all, and especially for workers. This is why we must support the legitimate struggle of the workers and the underprivileged against those who are arrogant. This is the line we at the Workers' House of the Islamic Republic of Iran have adopted. We have adopted a very clear stance vis-à-vis unjust governments, and of their peoples and their causes. We support all popular revolutions, liberation movements, movements for autonomy and movements which call for freedom. We support all sincere initiatives which have no connection with the forces of hegemony and dictatorship.

Once again, we would like to affirm our solidarity with the workers and people of South Africa. We strongly condemn every form of hegemony embodied by that country. The people must wake up to the realities which will help them to take their future into their own hands and attain freedom and independence. Above all, it must be self-reliant, and must not look to international hegemony, especially the great Satan, for help.

The South African people must continue to fight, to make sacrifices; they must assert themselves in the knowledge that justice is won, not given. They must act in a revolutionary spirit, and with immense determination, to eradicate every trace of apartheid. We say to you, if you do not learn to rely on yourselves, the colonialist regimes will hold you in thrall for all eternity. But if you draw on your own strength, you will overcome the imperialist hegemony.

The special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid deserves our full attention. However, despite the information provided there is not enough detail on the despicable racist practices which prevail.

We call on the international community and in particular on the delegates at this session of the Conference to put an end to what remains of apartheid forever. We call on the International Labour Organization and on the Director-General to do everything in their power to end the injustice and exclusion suffered by South African workers as a result of apartheid, to demand the repeal of all racist legislation and measures, to support trade union organizations and to help loosen the vice in which trade union leaders are locked, to improve workers' living conditions, ensure that workers enjoy all the rights due to them, help liberate political prisoners, to put an end to all negative legislation and assist free trade unions in their efforts to train young persons, fight unemployment among blacks, organize free and impartial elections without discrimination on the grounds of colour, race or religion so that a government which truly represents all sectors of the population can be formed.

We hope that the Committee on Action against Apartheid will, in its report, call on all member States to comply with the resolutions on a generalized boycott against the racist regime, until apartheid is eradicated.

We pray that God the all-powerful will help us to achieve victory so that the poor and the oppressed can throw off the yoke of injustice. There lies the path of divine grace. The black population and the workers of South Africa will have to pay the price of this awakening but they will be victorious in the end through God's will. We wish them health, happiness and success in their struggle. We hope they will be successful in finding freedom. These are the good wishes we send to all persons engaged in struggle.

May the grace of God, His mercy and peace be with you.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – It is good to see a strong American tripartite presence at this session on how to end the scourge of apartheid in South Africa.

A new era is dawning in South Africa. The process of positive change is marching forward. What the ILO needs now is to adopt a position that looks forward, not backward. The ILO should be in the forefront of international organizations instead of lagging behind the curve.

Soon, a non-racial Transitional Executive Council should be in place. This will provide the mechanism for further institutional change and the complete dismantling of apartheid. My Government strongly endorses this process and believes that an active ILO role will encourage the current South African Government to stay the course against those who would delay this process through violence and assassination.

Millions of South Africans still live in poverty and despair. Everyday they confront unemployment, homelessness, illiteracy and inadequate health care. The effects of apartheid will not disappear overnight. To assist in this process, the ILO must be in the forefront of international organizations providing assistance to South Africa in labour law reform, equality of rights, job creation and many other fields within its mandate.

The conclusions reached by the 1993 ILO Committee on Action against Apartheid contain an ambitious programme of action which my Government strongly endorses.

We have been long-standing members of the Conference Committee on Apartheid which reflects our steadfast commitment to dismantling the apartheid system in South Africa and we are pleased to join the consensus in support of its forward-looking conclusions this year as we near the end of the long struggle to terminate apartheid in that country. However, we do not support the parallel, contradictory theme that also runs through the report which we believe is based on old thinking. We share the Committee's strong criticism of the incidence of violence and the injustices which unfortunately continue to occur and we share its great concern about the danger of further possible destabilizing attempts to upset the democratization process from whichever quarter it may arise. But we think the time has long since come when the International Labour Conference should switch from a policy of enunciating disincentives to a policy of promoting operational incentives. We should drop the emphasis on sanctions (particularly the rhetorical emphasis on sanctions which have already been lifted by the world community), and concentrate more on a forward-looking ILO strategy that encourages the South African Government and civil society to continue down the road to political democracy and full respect for human rights and workers' rights.

To be sure, if there are significant steps backwards in this democratization process, then there should be provision for suspending assistance to South Africa, if warranted.

We have no quarrel with the conclusion to wait until next year to issue a report envisaging a full dismantling of sanctions, but we think there is an air of unreality to a document which merely speaks of reviewing its attachment to outworn sanctions that are more effective as rhetorical devices than as practical mechanisms.

We would have preferred a statement that concentrates exclusively on a positive ILO plan of action for South Africa.

Trade union and human rights are the bedrock of labour relations in democratic societies, but they will not suffice to overcome the years of neglect and oppression in South Africa. The ILO must help local bodies to undertake a full programme of action on education and training, the improvement of labour legislation and standards, the raising of occupational health and safety standards, the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment, and the reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration. Entrepreneurs and small businesses must be encouraged. The end result should be a robust and growing market economy to benefit all citizens. A democratic South Africa will not flourish unless it is accompanied by a vibrant market economy system that provides jobs for South Africans, jobs that pay a decent salary and provide adequate benefits to workers themselves and their families. A democratic South Africa will not flourish unless every South African can enter the job market armed with the appropriate qualifications and skills and have a fair chance to be hired regardless of race, creed, sex or national origin.

With the many pitfalls and dangers that lie ahead, the period of transition will be crucial for the future of South Africa. The country will need the maximum assistance to ensure that the process stays on course. National reconciliation and voter education will be essential to guarantee that South Africa creates the institutions to draft the Constitution of a democratic, non-racial society on a democratic basis. That means that workers will have to be educated on the meaning of and process involved in choosing representatives, that a government of the people, by the people and for the people results only when the people themselves participate and take informed, independent decisions. The Transitional Executive Council or Councils represents just one stage. The elections now set for April 1994 represent another. The ILO can help assure that these beginnings proceed smoothly. But they are only beginnings. Democracy can flourish best when it can guarantee all people food, shelter, health and employment.

The Government of the United States of America had asked that the 1993 Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid give a full vote of confidence to the people of South Africa and their ability to achieve a non-racial democratic society in the near future. We favour streamlined procedures to allow the ILO to act rapidly to suspend the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid and to undertake an intensive and far-reaching programme, once sufficient progress toward that goal was confirmed. We hope and trust that this report will allow the Governing Body and the Office to move forward.

We hope and trust that in 1994 this process will be so indelibly irreversible that the International Labour Conference will see its way clear to rescinding the Declaration and giving a full endorsement to a non-racial Government of South Africa. The ILO will then be able to participate fully in the rebuilding of South Africa, a South Africa in which every individual is equal under the law and has every opportunity to realize his or her potential. My Government has long supported international efforts to overturn apartheid. We shall stay the course. And when a democratic, non-racial South Africa has been created, we shall help the ILO to nourish and sustain it.

(Mr. Abdel-Hak takes the Chair.)

Original Arabic: Mr. HAIDOUB (Government delegate, Sudan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May we be allowed to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of this Conference.

I should like to inform you that we have read the Special Report of the Director-General on apartheid, which was submitted to the Conference and to the Committee on Action against Apartheid to bring us up to date with the latest developments in South Africa. Sudan is committed to the lofty values of equality among men. It has never ceased to monitor closely the tragic developments taking place in South Africa as a result of the apartheid system. Sudan has never ceased to express its support for all the peoples concerned, and to apply the sanctions imposed by the international organizations in the struggle against apartheid. There is no doubt that international pressure and the efforts of international organizations, as exemplified by the special Committee on Action against Apartheid and by the adoption of the Declaration in 1988, have begun to bear fruit recently, and led to the decision to hold elections.

However, we must be wary and see to it that the negotiations are not broken off, especially in the light of the political action which is still being waged against innocent people in South Africa. This is a negative factor which could undermine the success of the elections. Therefore we must strive for a favourable climate that will put an end to apartheid. This should consist, above all, in the abolition of apartheid legislation, with a view to enabling the entire South African people to participate on an equal footing in the process of transition towards a new system.

We feel that the International Labour Organization should remain faithful to the 1988 Declaration adopted by the International Labour Conference concerning action against apartheid.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee and the members of the Committee for the serious work they have undertaken and the conclusions they have reached, which have been submitted to us in Provisional Record No. 18. The delegation of Sudan fully supports these conclusions and we hope that next year, at the next session of the Conference, we will be able to say that the noble values of freedom and equality have prevailed in South Africa.

Original Arabic: The PRESIDENT – All the delegates' comments have been duly taken into account and will be recorded.

May I take it therefore that paragraphs 1 to 46 of the report have been adopted? There are no objections.

We shall now adopt the conclusions contained in paragraph 47 of this report. If there are no objections I shall consider them adopted.

(The report and conclusions are adopted.)

I should now like to share with you some of the ideas that passed through my mind as I listened to the statements made since this morning at the sitting on apartheid.

As I said this morning, the ending of apartheid in South Africa is one of the most important issues which the Conference has had before it. I have taken note of all the excellent documents submitted to us: the comprehensive Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, the report of the Governing Body's Committee on Apartheid and the report of the Group of Independent Experts dealing with the implementation of decisions on apartheid.

Last but not least, I read with great interest the Report of this Conference's Committee on Action against Apartheid, as published in Provisional Record No. 18, and also the useful supplements which the members of the Committee have been kind enough to provide.

Your debate today showed that there is a consensus among you regarding these three reports. Permit me now, as in my wont, to cast an eye towards the future.

What we are witnessing today in South Africa is close to miraculous. We are witnessing an enlargement of the area of understanding among the different groups. In this connection we welcome the historic step forward represented by the creation of the Transitional Executive Council and the elections which have been proposed for 27 April 1994.

The winds of democratic change which are evident in the preparations for these elections and the Constitution are undeniably the sign of a historic step forward. While looking to the future, I do not ignore the tremendous difficulties which our dear friend Nelson Mandela has described as "the last mile", and I appeal to all the parties concerned to help put an end to repression and prepare the way for democratic change.

I would like to ask a question which has been on the minds of many speakers today: what must we do to encourage this historic change towards a non-racist society in South Africa?

All of us have an important part to play in this transformation to a post-racist society. I welcome all the efforts made by international and regional organizations in this connection, particularly the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, the Commonwealth and the European Community.

Nevertheless, what is important for us at this Conference is to clearly define the role of the ILO. Here I would turn to all of you, to the Governing Body, to the Secretary-General of the Conference, and say that we should all strive together to draw up an overall programme of technical assistance in South Africa. The purpose of this programme will be to strengthen the efforts of the social partners to create a post-racist society.

To be specific, I believe that the ILO is in a unique position to provide assistance in two particular fields. First of all, it can help the different teams to devise the legislative framework and implement the laws on labour standards, as set forth in paragraph 15 of the Committee's Conclusions. Secondly, it can draw up technical cooperation programmes focusing on job creation and the enhancement of human resources, as set forth in paragraph 17 of the Committee's Report.

In conclusion, I should like to express warm thanks to the members of the Committee: Mr. Ejalu (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda), Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Hernandez (Employers' member, Philippines, Employers' Vice-Chairman); Mrs. Carr (Workers' member, Vice-Chairwoman), to whom we wish every success; and Mr. Veltheim (Government adviser, Finland), Reporter of the Committee.

I should like to take this opportunity to express gratitude and appreciation to the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Abdel-Rahman, and his team for the efforts they have deployed with a view to ensuring the success of the Committee's work. Mr. Abdel-Rahman is indeed worthy, by virtue of his diligence and his tireless dedication, of the title "son of the African continent".

ELEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – The first item on our agenda is the Eleventh Report of the Selection Committee (Provisional Record No. 5J). If there are no objections, may I take it that this report is adopted?

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (concl.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. TABANI) – We shall now continue our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. ANTONIOLI VAZQUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Peru) – I offer the President the most heartfelt congratulations of my country and myself on his appointment to chair this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference, and I extend those congratulations to the elected Vice-Presidents as well.

To the Director-General, I express my best wishes that in his next term of office at the head of the ILO his achievements will surpass the successes of the previous term.

At this session the Report of the Director-General places before us for debate a theme of great importance for the developing countries – social security. The contributions of the participants in this Conference will help us to make decisions in some cases and, in others, to endorse or re-evaluate earlier decisions. We therefore hope that the experiences we will now describe will be of interest to the participants of this Conference.

Our system of social security was devised at a time of relative economic stability; it has been deteriorating gradually because of a variety of administrative, economic and financial problems, such as structural deficiencies and inefficiently in the management of human resources, which prompted a marked drop in the quality and coverage of the services.

The economic crisis has led to a drop in social security contribution, from the State, and from workers and employers. This slump has been due, among other factors, to a contraction in real minimum wages. For example, in 1991 the real wage index had lost 70 per cent of its purchasing power and the salaries index had lost 72.8 per cent. The rise in open unemployment has also had an influence, as have the growth of the informal sector and the acceleration of inflation, which reached 7,647 per cent in 1990; compounding the problem are the arrears in the payment of contributions by the State.

In June of 1985, in a document entitled "Agreement on social security in Peru", signed by representatives of the National Society of Industry, the Confederation of Peruvian Workers, the National Confederation of Workers and the Confederation of Workers of the Peruvian Revolution, the social partners analysed the question of social security and recommended solutions. They concluded:

(1) that the social security system run by the Peruvian Institute of Social Security (IPSS) was affected by an acute crisis which was jeopardizing its very stability;

(2) that in recent years there had been embezzlement of funds which affected the financing of the pensions scheme, among others;

(3) that the management of resources at the IPSS was not only inadequate but was blatantly deficient in terms of the services offered to the insured population;

(4) that IPSS investments were marked by a lack of foresight as regards insufficient investments, the loss of resources, the illegal use of reserves, a negligent ignorance of the inflationary context facing the country's economy, and the loss of reserves owing to fraud; and lastly

(5) that the deficient and limited return in terms of services for insured people was due not to a shortage but to an excess of administrative personnel and their lack of discipline and organization.

The signatories recommended that the pensions scheme run by the State be restructured in accordance with technical criteria so as to protect the real value of pensions through appropriate alternatives and options, as defined by experts in the private sector.

The recommendations of the "Agreement on social security in Peru", signed by the employers and workers, were not welcomed by the previous Government, which allowed the irregularities we have noted to continue unabated.

At present, the health care scheme, by applying a policy of rationalization of human resources and economic and financial resources and decentralization of services, has been improving gradually; unfortunately, the same cannot be said of the pensions scheme.

The pensions scheme, based on a pay-as-you-go system of funding, was established at a time when there was a large active tax-paying workforce, a low proportion of pensioners, lower life expectancy and a lower fertility rate.

This system began to face serious problems of an actuarial deficit of insured persons; for years, imbalanced financing brought the scheme close to collapse. This was evidenced by the meagre pensions paid as well as the low real value of contributions of employers, workers and the State. The system was thus completely unable to meet current challenges and was failing to meet the most elementary obligations to pensioners.

It was necessary to create a new pensions scheme. Hence, one of the main objectives of the present Government was to establish a system which, through free competition, would seek to improve substantially pensions and extend them to other sectors. This new option was geared to ensure that funds acquired would be used to build up major sources of savings, investment and employment, and to give workers the option of selecting the new schemes.

Therefore, it was urgent and necessary to enact legal instruments which would establish appropriate mechanisms for the granting of pension sums which would be consistent with the expectations of and contributions made by the workers.

Thus, on 8 November 1991, Legislative Decree No. 724 was promulgated; it had been the subject of a painstaking analysis, leading to Legislative Decree No. 25879 and its regulations in Presidential Decree No. 206-92-EF, which created a private system of pensions. These pensions are to be administered by the so-called "Pension Fund Administrators", whose main aim is to contribute to the development and strengthening of the pension system in the country. Participation in the system is voluntary; it is financed by a contribution of mandatory and voluntary contributions from workers. Contributions are deposited in an individual account, whose balance determines the eventual benefits. Time will tell whether the decision we have taken is correct.

I do not wish to conclude this statement without paying a heartfelt tribute to our trade unionists, to our workers, industrial relations officers, heads of personnel, doctors, engineers and sociologists who have given their lives in defence of their workplaces against terrorists. This attitude has played a fundamental role in the comprehensive process of pacification undertaken by my Government, which has made it possible almost completely to dismantle the Tupac-Amaru (MRTA) terrorist group, and capture 90 per cent of the Shining Path terrorist movement.

In this context, I would like to highlight Pedro Huilca Tecse, a fine man and an even better trade union leader. We often disagreed but we would always find a common point from which to resume our negotiations. Here, in this forum, one year ago, we drew up the guidelines for a national agreement for industrial peace. These guidelines were provisionally agreed upon at the ILO regional Conference held in Caracas in October 1992, with a view to launching the national agreement in January of this year. Unfortunately, Pedro Huilca was cruelly murdered on 18 December 1992. His murderers have already been captured and identified as members of the Shining Path terrorist group and are awaiting trial. Thus, we refute all the insidious charges which were levelled concerning this painful event.

In the meetings held last year, the following people were also present: Valentín Pacho, the Chairman of the CGTP; Juan Luna Rojas, the General Secretary of the CTP; Julio Cruzado, the Secretary for International Affairs of the CTDP; and Alfredo Lazo Peralta, the General Secretary of the CATP, who today is rightly the Peruvian Workers' delegate to this 80th Session of the International Labour Conference. And I say rightly because for more than 20 years there has been a gentlemen's agreement between the various workers' Confederations and the Government of my country – an agreement according to which the representation of workers at international meetings organized by the ILO rotates among them. Last year the CGTP attended this Conference; the Caracas meeting was attended by CTP, the Peruvian Workers Central. This year it has been the turn of the Autonomous Central of Peruvian Workers (CATP) to represent the workers in Geneva. If any confederation wishes to denounce this agreement, my Government is not opposed, and will accept the decision of all the workers involved in this gentlemen's agreement.

My Government is a fervent advocate of the idea that problems between capital and labour cannot be resolved without tripartism, that is free of demagogy and the imposition of impracticable conditions. To all the workers who still think they live in the best of all possible worlds, and that nothing has changed, I appeal that they join this struggle against poverty, misery, unemployment and underdevelopment. Today, more than ever, we need to join our forces to give our children a better future.

Mr. BURGE (Employers' delegate, United States) – It is my pleasure to come here today to participate in the discussion of the Report of the Director-General. I extend to the President and Vice-Presidents warm greetings and congratulations on behalf of my delegation.

The Director-General correctly concludes that a great deal of technical cooperation and assistance will be needed to promote social protection.

The International Labour Organization can play a major role in assisting developing countries in formulating and implementing small-scale, less formal systems of social protection that fit the national circumstances. Considerable creativity, innovation and flexibility will be required to fulfil the prerequisites for establishing a social protection programme: full employment, steady economic growth, functioning financial markets and good governance.

In creating a social safety net one must not lose the important focus of getting people back to work. Creativity and flexibility will be required to address the needs of the workers of individual countries that are at different stages of economic development and of those economies that are in transition.

This creativity and flexibility will be critical to the future success of the ILO. It is important that the ILO rethink the strategies, structure and staffing that will drive the tactical objectives of the future. The world has changed dramatically in the past decade; the fall of communism and the shift to privatization in many countries calls for new and enlightened approaches to the ILO's responsibility for developing productive employment and enhancing social progress.

We must not fear these changes; rather, all associated with the ILO should welcome this time of transition as an opportunity to re-evaluate our strategies, our priorities, and our allocation of resources.

For several decades the International Labour Organization has heard my predecessor, Charlie Smith, advocate the use of the free market as the most efficient mechanism to allocate resources in a manner that will bring about a steady increase in the standard of living of any society.

A free market needs competition and lots of it; more competition means more choice at better price and quality for the consumer. As we contemplate the dramatic shift that we have seen from the planned economies towards the market economies, at the same time as the less developed nations have been striving to become more developed, think of the tremendous opportunities that stand before the ILO today and in the near future.

United States employers believe that the programme and budget submitted by the Director-General for the next two years is a small step in the right direction, but it only makes a modest transition to the new high-performance organization that is needed to address the changing world environment. The overriding priority of the ILO remains the development, implementation and enforcement of international labour standards.

International labour standards should not be considered as ends in themselves, but as means to balance the growth of national wealth and productive employment with social justice and security. The practical value of Conventions and other standards depends entirely on the extent to which they are ratified and enforced.

A quick study of the record of ratifications clearly demonstrates that the time and resources devoted to the establishment and supervision of standards is not justified by the number of ratifications by member States. The average number of ratifications for the 17 Conventions adopted from 1980 to 1990 is less than 12 per Convention.

The ILO must base its strategy on the establishment of a climate of freedom and flexibility which favours private initiative, a market economy based upon the autonomy of all parties, government, labour and employers, and a firm commitment to the development and training of a high-performance workforce. Thus, the international labour standards which are limited to general principles on which there is broad consensus would be a much more constructive contribution to today's world economy and competitive environment.

Employment is the first priority and should dominate all programmes of the ILO. The absence of freely chosen employment presents a serious danger to democracy and to the quality of working conditions, and is the principal source of poverty.

A period of zero growth for the budget of the ILO calls for a reprioritization of available resources. The Director-General has placed budget emphasis on international labour standards, and for the reasons just cited, United States employers feel this is an inappropriate allocation of resources.

Structural adjustment is a constant necessity for every enterprise. In my company, Motorola, if we were to become complacent and satisfied with our current achievements, we would soon find ourselves at a competitive disadvantage because the expectations of our customers would not be satisfied and our competition would pass us in service, productivity and quality. Like many progressive employers, we prepare our organization for change; all employees participate in training and education each year to keep skills current and to prepare for advancement. Goals and objectives are constantly reviewed to assure that the organization is challenged to realize its ultimate potential.

The ILO must also assess its customers' needs and continuously seek new and innovative means of response to a constantly changing environment. New alliances must be formed; staff must be retrained; new skills and abilities must be added to the ILO staff portfolio; and resources must be reallocated in a manner consistent with new priorities. New capabilities and change must be the norms in order to improve the ILO's effectiveness. The best practices of the private and public sector should be benchmarked to set the highest performance standards for the ILO.

The ILO has the opportunity, now as never before, to assume a world leadership position to help member States move in the direction of creating healthy economies and productive employment. Employers and workers must be trained and assisted in playing a part in the political and economic life of the nation. They must be helped to understand the dynamics of a market economy. Again, benchmarking best practices in this area would be an expedient way of flexibly translating the past successes of other member States to the current needs of nations in transition.

Given the lack of new resources, the ILO must re-evaluate priorities and restructure, as many major employers have done over the past decade. Clear priorities centred around the promotion of freely chosen employment must be established, specific goals must be communicated, and staff must be mobilized to utilize its tripartite structure.

The employers of the United States continue to pledge our support of and cooperation with the ILO, governments and workers, as we collectively promote policies that will create quality employment for the people of all nations.

Original Spanish: Mr. PINZON SALAZAR (Workers' delegate, Guatemala) – May I join all previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the chair of the 80th Session of the Conference and Mr. Michel Hansenne on his re-election for a new term of office as Director-General of the ILO. I wish them every success in dealing with the many challenges awaiting them.

On behalf of the working class and people of Guatemala, I wish to thank the international community for the solidarity it displayed during the abominable coup d'Etat perpetrated by the dictator Jorge Serrano Elias. I would like to take this opportunity to inform you that Guatamalan civil society, joining national and international condemnation of the coup d'Etat of 25 May, showed unprecedented determination in leaping to the defence of the country's institutions, the rule of law and the Constitution, and succeeded within 12 days in restoring full legality without spilling a single drop of blood. It now has a new Constitutional President, Ombudsman Ramiro de León Carpio.

After more than 30 years of an odious and unjust war, Guatemala has developed a culture of individual and collective insecurity, a culture of disintegration, marginalization and discrimination. Over 40,000 Guatemalans are still living beyond our borders. There are thousands and thousands of widows and orphans, the casualties of violence, who hope that social protection and security may one day allow them to lead a decent and more human life. Over 60 per cent of the Guatemalan population are live in rural areas, belonging to 22 indigenous ethnic groups. However, more than 65 per cent of the land is concentrated in the hands of 2.2 per cent of the private sector. In the countryside, social vulnerability and insecurity are a fact of life. The indiscriminate use of insecticides and pesticides affects the human environment, converting the waters of the rivers and lakes into a living threat to the rural population and destroying the forest, the mountains and the fauna in general.

The services provided by the defective social security scheme are also discriminatory because they do not cover the poorest sectors who need them most: peasants, self-employed workers in the informal economy, those living in remote areas, pensioners and the unemployed.

The Director-General addressed the issue of social insurance and social protection in his Report in full knowledge of its topicality, challenging the neo-liberal project of using adjustment programmes to deliver the coup de grâce to social security programmes, privatizing them and turning them into profit-making speculative ventures in the service of an already excessively privileged minority.

The Director-General also challenges and exposes those States, particularly certain developing countries, which have created a culture of privilege and corruption through social security. We can affirm from experience that social security, and the Guatemalan Social Security Institute in particular, have for 39 years been fleecing the workers and lining the pockets of the families and close friends of those who ruled the country during those years.

Social security has been used as a party political tool and nest egg for one government after another, who embezzle funds and use them for purposes that are totally incompatible with the goals of social protection and security of their compatriots.

At the same time, a culture of social indifference, neglect and insensitivity has been created and developed. The ideals of service and human fellowship have been abandoned. Owing to the misappropriation of economic resources, there are no funds to invest in the country's infrastructure, which is in a lamentable condition. Machinery and equipment remain out of order because of the lack of proper and timely maintenance. There are also constant complaints and criticism because medical supplies have run short or are outdated.

Humanitarian facilities for those in need of social security services are abysmal. It seems that everyone is conspiring to destabilize social security plans and programmes, doing their utmost to justify any attempt to privatize social security in the country.

Another phenomenon that conspires to sabotage Guatemala's social security is the dishonest and corrupt attitude of some employers, especially in certain milling and public-sector industries. The millers deduct social security contributions from wages but withhold the funds from the social security authorities. For example, between 1987 to 1992 the milling industry created more than 70,000 jobs but no more than 9,000 new contributors were recorded in the social security system. This shows the scale of the misappropriation of funds. But the root of the problem is not just economic evasion by the majority of millers. It is the callous and intolerable violation of human rights in the form of lamentable industrial social security provisions and abysmal human relations. Without exaggeration, the conditions may be described as a form of slavery. They are actually worse than those prevailing at the beginning of the industrial era. All the abuses I have mentioned occur with the complicity of the government authorities themselves, who through fear or threats of a mass exodus of the country's millers, neither comply nor demand compliance with industrial security and human rights legislation. This makes them accomplices by omission.

The application of an honest social security policy consistent with the needs and aspirations of the people is a question of ethical and moral values, but it is also a matter of developing and making the most of human potential and of having the political will to take up this major challenge, one that also concerns the ILO and its associated services, particularly those relating to technical cooperation.

In conclusion, I should like to say that I share the Director-General's concerns with regard to social insurance and social protection, especially when he says that "social expenditures merit a higher degree of protection against policies of economic stabilization and monetary restriction, and an even higher priority where budgets are unduly focused on military spending or on spending directed towards the more affluent groups of society".

It is true that in Guatemala a large portion of the budget is invested in problems of military confrontation but the signs of the time, especially the election of a new President who enjoys considerable national and international credibility, inspire us with confidence that armed struggle will very soon come to an end and the resources released will be reinvested in human development on behalf of the neediest sectors of Guatemala's population. The pessimism and frustration caused by the coup d'état of 25 May have abated and we hope that unless the corrupt mafia of our country get their claws into the new President, these feelings will turn into hope for progress in solving the problems afflicting us, especially those of an ethical and moral nature.

We trust that we can bury the rancour and hatred once and for all and devote ourselves to our country's reconstruction with enthusiasm and solidarity. I call for the same solidarity from all the delegates to this 80th Session of the Conference with the Colombian trade unionists of TELECOM who, ironically, are being deprived of their freedom and are accused of being terrorists for defending the sacred national interests of telecommunications.

Original French: Mr. BRIESCH (Workers' delegate, France) – Although we are not too far from the conclusion of this session of the Conference, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election and on the way in which he has conducted our work.

All the speakers before me have stressed the topical character and the relevance of the Report submitted to us this year by the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne. The situation in the non-industrialized countries and Central and Eastern Europe alone suffices to justify this Report. However, the increasing economic and social difficulties which we are encountering today in the industrialized countries contribute to providing these analyses and proposals with a universality which concerns us all.

The social security budget in France is 1,700 billion francs, an amount greater than the state budget. The entire population receives old-age, illness and family allowances, be it in exchange for contributions or through a form of national solidarity. These social systems are managed by the social partners. Nearly all of the systems' funding comes from employment income. In addition to these benefits, I should mention the system of unemployment compensation, a topic also referred to in the Report, and which in France has the same features as the ones that I have referred to here.

All of our social security schemes are in a precarious or even ill state of health. We all know the affliction – deficits. Their causes are just as well known, although they are more numerous and more complex. First of all there is demographic growth which increases life expectancy which is already among the highest on the planet. This naturally affects the pension and health insurance schemes. Then there are technological improvements, which increase costs, and the apparently insurmountable obstacle to reducing health expenditure posed by the medical and pharmaceutical lobbies. Finally, and above all, evolution of our economy, with more than 3 million people unemployed and the exclusion of young people from the labour market.

All this might cause still more exclusions and could bring about a double standard in the social protection system. Thus, my country too needs to find solutions to uphold the essential values of social protection, which include fairness in financing, a just treatment of citizens and an effective and lasting way of operating the schemes. For this purpose it is necessary for us to review the methods of financing according to two principles: firstly, that benefits available to all should be financed by all, and by all income; and secondly that those benefits which are provided under labour contracts should be financed by employment income. Otherwise the schemes may fall apart. We know that this presupposes that the types of benefit should be separated into those linked to solidarity and those related to contributions.

In the part of the Report entitled "The Agenda for Strategy" the Director-General points out quite correctly that in industrialized countries protection is nearly universal. This is true, but if we are not careful it will become more fragile and those countries, such as mine, which have been able to set up a system of efficient protection will progressively witness a deterioration of benefits as contributions increase and, above all, more people are excluded from coverage.

Our concern stretches to other continents as well. The peoples of the developing countries and those nearer to us, in Central and Eastern Europe, are in a situation where it is not a question of saving or strengthening social protection systems, but of creating or reorienting them.

The idea has been expressed from this rostrum that member States should at least ratify those Conventions relating to subjects not conditioned by the level of economic development. References have been made to freedom of association, the abolition of forced labour, non-discrimination in employment and the minimum age for employment. I do not intend to challenge or accept this argument, the merits of which can be debated some other time. I believe that the role of the ILO is in part to assist all these developing countries to reach a higher level of social protection. We do not believe that it is enough to limit ourselves to saying that Convention No. 102 has been ratified by only 35 States, challenging its relevance. There are fields which, though closely linked to the level of economic development, should be given the highest priority by the State. Social protection is one such domain. This is a field in which technical cooperation is fully justified and in which the ILO has obtained experience and become competent.

On the eve of the 75th anniversary we should bear this objective in mind along with others as we think about these matters, so as not to call into question our basic mandate, i.e. the improvement of the lot of workers. We believe that although it is sometimes necessary to stop along the path we have taken to see how far we have come, this does not mean we should stop building the very system of protection which justifies our existence. The work begun this year by our Conference with reference to part-time work demonstrates to anyone who may have had any doubt that there is a need for the ILO to improve further its arsenal of protection so that it may respond better to changes in the way we work at the end of this century. But this necessary adaptation should not lead us to abandon existing protection mechanisms which many countries have not as yet ratified, and which, we may recall, are the safety net for a minimum of protection in the world of work.

Let us hope that on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of our Organization we shall be able to record important progress in this field.

(Mr. Gray takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. SALAS (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) – Allow me to extend my congratulations to the President on election to the chair of this important session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to emphasize the importance of the fact that the Director-General has chosen for his Report the themes of the struggle against poverty, the protection of the working people and the problems related to these central issues.

The statements of the Workers' delegates which we have heard so far have confirmed that growing poverty, unemployment, wage erosion, the breaking down of social security systems, the proliferation of child labour and other phenomena are all contributing to the impoverishment of the workers. These problems are common to a large number of countries, particularly the so-called underdeveloped countries, although of course they may have different origins, different characteristics and consequences from one country to another.

In Bolivia, the urban and rural workers grouped together in the Bolivian Workers' Central Confederation are faced with the so-called structural adjustment policies which in the social sphere impose a global strategy the ultimate aim of which is to convert the work of man into the cheapest merchandise on a market governed by supply and demand.

A law called the law of free recruitment is the instrument which has made it possible and which is continuing to make it possible for the State as an employer and for private entrepreneurs to dismiss more than one hundred thousand persons to date, raising the level of unemployment to unprecedented levels, which are masked by statistical tricks so that the results are credible only to those who have produced them. At the same time systems of work have emerged such as temporary work contracts, subcontracting, and export processing zones "maquilas" which leave it to the discretion of the employer to fix the wage and the duration of the contract and which have eliminated any form of legal insurance and protection for the workers who are obliged to submit to these new forms of exploitation.

The privatization of state enterprises, without account being taken of production factors, public investment, profitability, or even less national interest, has begun to show its anti-social dimension in the form of further dismissals of workers, reductions in wages and the elimination of rights acquired by the workers during many long years of struggle. What is serious is that the State is relieved of any responsibility as regards the management of the national economy, the distribution of any surplus, leaving the economic, political and social development of the country in private hands, which are rather transnational that national, and at the same time, concentrating wealth amongst a tiny fraction of entrepreneurs to the detriment of the population at large. It is also necessary at this point to state that this policy of extreme privatization is not the result of national need and necessity but rather the consequence of the commitments which the Government has been obliged to make to multilateral and multinational organizations, such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the Club of Paris, etc.

The system of social security based on the principles of solidarity, universality and contributions from the workers, the employers and the State is seriously threatened by these neo-liberal currents, which are presented under the euphemistic terms of reform, modernization, the right to choose and other such euphemisms which in fact seek to eliminate these rights and place the burden exclusively on the shoulders of the workers, and, into the bargain, allowing private capital to manage the funds provided by the working population.

Needless to say, the cutting down of labour costs is the main reason for the imposition of this system, which in no way is new and which cannot in any sense be called social security.

On the other hand, the Bolivian workers are not unaware of the weaknesses and difficulties which at present affect our system, and for this reason we have tried to establish measures which must be adopted to guarantee the solvency of the social insurance system.

These measures are: to guarantee the strict payment of contributions by the workers, employers and the State as laid down by law; to recuperate the debts running into millions owed by private entrepreneurs and state enterprises in respect of contributions and the improper retention of workers' contributions; to ensure that those responsible pay the costs of the negative repercussions of these massive dismissals; to extend the universe of insured persons within the single social security system; to eliminate the bureaucracy and partisan nature of the social insurance; of social security management machinery to eradicate corruption.

There is no doubt whatsoever that the possible application of the so-called "reforms" or "modernization" of social insurance in Bolivia will mean a real tragedy for many hundreds of thousands of beneficiaries and persons entitled to benefits, who would thus lose their only opportunity of obtaining medical care and an old age pension or disability pension. In other words, they would be absolutely destitute and would have no means of subsistence whatsoever. Considering the serious implications which would result from this so-called "reform" with which we are threatened, my organization will very shortly organize a National Congress on Social Security, the aim of which will be to identify weaknesses in the functioning of the social insurance system and to try to define ways and means of maintaining social insurance within the context of solidarity and universality and efficient management.

The harsh experience of the workers and the majority of the population following the introduction of the neo-liberal model has convinced us that social cruelty is inherent to this concept and its implementation. The growth of the informal sector of the economy, the exodus of workers from rural areas towards the cities, the increasing number of child and adult beggars are all evidence of the truth of what we are saying. No matter how many commitments are made by the Government to the effect that the social debt will be paid, these conditions are not changing; indeed they are getting worse, despite the statistical manipulations which seem to indicate improvements at the macro-economic level and the aim of which is to present Bolivia as a country of development and economic boom.

This panorama must necessarily have consequences at both the political and social levels, particularly since attempts are always made to link democracy with structural adjustment policies. This creates an image in people's minds of a political regime which instead of solving our problems does exactly the opposite; and the same applies as regards relations between the State, entrepreneurs and workers, simply because it is not possible for them to sit down together and develop economic and social policies which take into account the interests and essential needs of the workers and the majority of the population.

For these reasons, it is imperative to strengthen the role of the ILO in the defence of the rights of the workers in their attempts to preserve their rights, eliminate poverty and ensure that social justice reigns throughout our planet.

Mr. BARAK (Government delegate, Israel) – Allow me first to express, on behalf of the Government of Israel, our warmest congratulations to the President and his Vice-Presidents on their election and to the Director-General on his re-election.

The subject which the Director-General has chosen for his Report this year, Social insurance and social protection, is indeed of major importance to all countries in the world.

The Israeli social security system is made up of two tiers. The first tier consists of compulsory insurance according to the National Insurance Act, the aim of which is to guarantee for each insured person a minimum benefit in the main branches of social security. Most of the benefits such as old-age pensions and survivors' allowances are of a fixed rate but some of them, namely unemployment and employment injury benefits, are calculated as a percentage of the previous income of the insured person.

The second tier, covering old-age, invalidity and widowhood pensions, medical care and sickness benefits, is, in its main part, half voluntary and is based mainly on collective agreements. All of the benefits in this tier are income-related.

Public officials in Israel are insured for complementary earnings-related pension by virtue of a special Act. There is also an Act covering sickness benefits but it applies only to persons not already covered by collective bargaining arrangements. For the self-employed there is no institutionalized framework of income-related pension insurance except for private arrangements by means of savings programmes in banks or insurance companies.

The fact that there is no relationship between the first and second tiers of social insurance in Israel is the cause of some serious concern. Maintaining an institutionalized pension insurance from several systems which are not linked or coordinated with each other may lead to very high exchange rates which may put a heavy burden on the financial stability of the system.

This phenomenon has not arisen yet, but, given the present maturation rate of pension rights, it may indeed appear in the future, in which case some changes in pension arrangements are likely to be required.

Let me turn now to some of the items dealt with in the agenda of this Conference.

The percentage of persons employed part time in Israel and in other countries is rising steadily. In Israel, it increased from 19.7 per cent in 1979 to 23.9 per cent in 1989, with the increase applying both to men and women.

Persons employed part time include those who prefer to do so, as well as those who would prefer to work full time but are required to content themselves with part-time work. This second group is included in the statistics of "employed persons", although, from the economic point of view, they represent an incomplete use of the available workforce.

Recently, the significance of part-time work has been emphasized because of its contribution to the reduction of overall unemployment. With more part-time work, a greater number of people can participate in the workforce in a set period. But, as previously mentioned, this does not reduce the scope of economic unemployment or, in other words, the non-use of existing resources.

As for wages and social benefits, there is no difference in Israel between full-time and part-time workers, who are entitled to the same wages and social rights as full-time workers, except that these are of course calculated relative to the degree of the actual part-time job.

Regarding the issue of the prevention of industrial disasters, Israel has had its share of accidents in the chemical and petrochemical industries, either connected with fires, explosions or the release of poisonous chemicals.

Due to these occurrences, legislation relating to various aspects of the problem was promulgated and enforced, including the setting up of mobile emergency equipment at strategic positions to facilitate immediate response to accidents, identifying the concentration of dangerous substances, evaluating the risk to the surrounding population, including the possibility of evacuation, and taking decisions on actions to be taken to contain the dangerous substance or fire.

The environmental aspects of the everyday activities connected with chemicals, as well as emergency steps to be taken in case of an incident, are taken into consideration when permits are issued to import, purchase or manufacture dangerous chemicals. To an increasing extent, the managers of plants handling or manufacturing dangerous chemicals are asked to prepare emergency plans and safety programmes and train their staff accordingly.

Furthermore, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs has launched a project to identify and evaluate major chemical hazards. The project, which is to start in the coming months, is planned around the following stages:

- Firstly, the recruitment and training of a group of chemical engineers with experience in the theories and practical implications of hazard identification, hazard analysis and, as a result of these, planning and installation of safety features to avoid the occurrence of process failure that can lead to a disaster situation.
- The second stage will be a field study, to be implemented in a number of plants in the chemical, petrochemical and pesticide industry, where processes will be analysed according to the different models mentioned above.
- In the last stage of the project, and based on the results of the field study, the appropriate legislation will be prepared, based on the principles of the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. We shall be ready to share the results of this project with the ILO and with other countries or interested bodies so as to enable others to deal with these problems.

As regards ILO programmes for technical assistance, I would like to highlight the joint efforts in the area of training and education between the ILO's Cooperative Branch and Israel's International Institute for Development, Cooperation and Labour Studies. There are also plans for expanding these activities in the future.

I would like, moreover, to note with great satisfaction the work being done by the Workers' Education and Technical Cooperation Branch of the ILO with this Israeli institute. We look forward to further enhancing these endeavours in the future.

In conclusion, may I say that this has been an important year, not only in matters concerning labour and social rights but also in that more general area concerning the political climate, which is so essential for the development of social progress.

The advances in understanding which have taken place within the Middle East peace process inspire us all with hope for a better and more secure future. We look forward to a Middle East free at last from the scourge of war in which the full potential of all the peoples of our area may be realized.

Original French: Mr. RABEMANANTSOA (Workers' delegate, Madagascar) – I would like to join the preceding speakers in congratulating the President on the confidence shown in him by this assembly. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General on his re-election. In the name of the Malagasy workers, I would like to wish them full success.

The Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), constitutes a reference for all Members of the ILO, but the values conferred upon it differ from one Member to another because of the diversity of structure and legislation of each member country.

If the Convention does provide for flexibility in its application and progressive generalization, which of course assists the common approach to the problem of social security in all member countries, it is evident from the Director-General's Report that much remains to be done. On the one hand, the differences between countries of the industrial system can be explained by the difference in speed of their economic development. On the other hand, differences between the countries of the industrial system and the rest of the world arise from the insufficiency or inexistence of the structures and institutions which would allow the provision of minimum social protection.

In view of the general recession, countries which benefit from a regime of social security are menaced by restrictions to their acquired rights. The less favoured, are confronted with enormous problems of means and difficulty in fulfilling the necessary conditions for the institution of a pertinent social security system, and that is becoming a difficult ideal to achieve.

If these are the problems relating to the generalization of a regime of social security in the member countries, their solutions conflict in the action led by the different organs of the United Nations. Indeed, the flexibility and progressivity recognized in the Convention are opposed to the rigid and obligatory measures of the structural adjustment programme. The ILO is the sole tripartite Organization within the United Nations and it would be desirable to review and rethink its relations with the other organs to give their actions greater impact within the framework of the development of the member countries. Structural adjustment must be flexible in the application and must be progressive, otherwise, instead of promoting the generalization of legislation which should lead to a guarantee acceptable to all, we should run the risk of watching passively while budgetary and financial constraints become the general rule in our societies.

As concerns social security, Madagascar has not as yet ratified Convention No. 102 but has ratified the Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19), and the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118). The system of social security in Madagascar was established the 1950s through an inter-occupational retirement provident fund (MIRT) and the Tananarive Inter-Enterprise Health Organization, (OSTIE). In 1962 MIRT became a national family allowances and industrial accident fund (CNAFAT); In 1968 this fund was extended to cover other aspects of social security (health insurance, old-age insurance, pensions, invalidity, etc.) and later became the National Fund for Social Services (CNAPS). Although not perfect, this system is well developed and constitutes an appropriate basis for the further development of the social security system in Madagascar.

What has blocked this system to a great extent is the direct intervention of the State in the administration and management of social security organs. Instead of acting as arbitrator, ensuring the trusteeship and the control of the existing regulations, the State has become judge and party, accumulating incompatible functions. In view of the continuing degradation of the living standard in Madagascar, improvement in mechanisms for social protection is all the more urgently required, as regards both health care and cash benefits, while the resources and means to achieve this, if not already obsolete, are very scarce.

One of the principal demands of the Malagasy trade unions, formulated in a memorandum of 15 points in 1990, was the establishment of an administrative body and special management councils in which workers and employers, the contributors to the fund, and health bodies should participate in the administration and management. The State should only be a supervisory authority in this connection.

Following this claim, which was never taken up, there was a nationwide protest in the year which followed. Claims changed in nature. More corporate to begin with, they had become highly political, namely, the holding of a national conference, the drawing up of a new Constitution, and free elections. These events affected some 350,000 persons in the capital alone, and the workers took to the streets for seven months in order to stress their will for change. The transition government afterwards decided that as a priority the State should withdraw from these organizations and retain only its supervisory role.

The administrative council for the CNAPS and the management councils for the OSTIE were established as of last year, and have a mandate to the whole social security system and direct its future reorientation.

If in 1990 the active population was estimated at 50 per cent of the population, which is 12 million inhabitants, the workers of the formal sector benefiting from social security facilities represented only 12 per cent of the active population. On account of the low level of these benefits, workers who have the means, in particular managerial staff, contract additional insurance.

The mandate of these councils consists in the stabilization of the social security system and at the same time the identification of possibilities of integrating agricultural workers, that is small family farmers and those of the informal sector, about 88 per cent of the active population, into the social security system. These possibilities must be formulated within the general social security policy which should lead to objectives and programmes for its extension to the different levels of the population.

In this connection I must stress the important contribution of the ILO in the ongoing audit of the CNAPS and to express the hope that the health organizations will participate in the development of the OSTIE system. The workers of Madagascar appreciate the just value of the participation of the ILO in this field at at time when we are working out a system of social security of a more extended character.

By way of conclusion, I should like to stress, that following the nationwide protest to stress its will for change, Madagascar has been witnessing a democratic wind for several months. Indeed, in August 1992 the people were called upon to approve a new Constitution, after a silence of 16 long years imposed by a dictatorial regime. In November of last year, as in February of this year, eight candidates presented themselves for election as President of Madagascar on a democratic basis. On 16 June 1993, legislative elections took place and, at present, voting is being carried out in a climate of confidence for all the forthcoming elections. It is to be hoped that this new impetus will provide the people of Madagascar with decent conditions of work with fundamental rights such as those of food, lodging, education, and access for all to health services, assured. We hope also that the new impetus will enable the 88 per cent of the active population who have been excluded for a long time from any social cover to enjoy a minimal guarantee of social security.

Original German: Mr. THÜSING (Employers' delegate, Germany) – I would like to congratulate the President and then say a few comments about the Director-General's Report.

First of all may I say that the Report is a very objective one, meticulous and discriminating in the analyses it makes and realistic in its conclusions. It leaves no doubt as to the tremendous difficulties entailed by the task of ensuring an adequate degree of social insurance for those who do not live in developed countries and yet there is no capitulation in the face of this difficulty. I believe that it is a good Report and I would like to address my warmest thanks and my respect to the Director-General. This is not the first time that the International Labour Organization has dealt with the question of social insurance and social protection, as the Report itself makes clear; and yet it must be conceded that of the 11 Conventions which have been adopted since 1945, only two have been ratified by more than 30 countries. That is to say, by less than 20 per cent of the present members of the ILO.

Two things here become clear. These Conventions set standards which most member States have been, and remain, unable to implement and which therefore are not binding, even when ratified.

However, at the same time, and this is the second point, this did not prevent those same member States here from giving their agreement to those Conventions in Geneva, and this is not to mention the many Recommendations and resolutions which cost nothing to adopt and which were widely supported in the reassuring knowledge that they were not legally binding.

There is something wrong here, and not only here: the same discrepancy between aspirations and reality, between input and output, also characterizes the entire standard-setting activity of the International Labour Organization.

In order not to be misunderstood I would like to say that standard-setting activities remain and will continue to remain among the most important tasks of the Conference. After all, here in Geneva Conventions have been adopted which have changed the social environment, and this should not be forgotten. However, what is happening now has very little to do with that, and if the Conference continues in this way then the ILO's credibility, and therefore its moral and political authority, will inevitably be undermined. That is not in anyone's interests.

In view of this, I see the ILO's contribution to improving social protection as lying less in its standard-setting activities than in the area of technical cooperation in relation to the structure and development of social security systems. My emphasis is therefore precisely the opposite of that of the Director-General's Report.

The Report shows how very difficult it is to apply the experience of the developed countries in developing social insurance systems. The general environment and the requirements are too varied, and not only in terms of resources. However, there is one basic principle which I should highlight and that is the principle that the right to solidarity should not be at the expense of a reasonable degree of individual responsibility to provide for one's own future.

The definition of what is reasonable for the individual will vary greatly from one country to another. Not infrequently, the level of what is considered reasonable is often set at zero: people living at the very limits of subsistence level cannot be expected to make independent provision for their future. Under those circumstances, there is only recourse to solidarity – first of all the solidarity of the family, and then of the wider community. In many cases, the paucity of the resources available for solidarity-based provision means that the question of where the boundary should lie between community solidarity and individual provision is not raised at all.

However, whenever a degree of independent provision can reasonably be expected, however modest it may be, it should be mandatory. This is a fundamental question which must be tackled in good time, and which relates both to the type of contingency to be covered and the degree of cover.

I do not wish here to go into the details of financial viability and the associated economic implications, although such issues have become increasingly important in countries with well-developed social security systems, particularly in western Europe, and they will become more acute as a result of demographic developments and advances in cost-intensive medicine. Here the boundary between solidarity and individual provision will inevitably need to be redefined. This is absolutely in keeping with the principle of social justice, since what an individual can do for himself should not be paid for by others, by the community. Obviously, this necessary adjustment is perceived by the individual as a sacrifice, as an assault, and this is understandable, particularly when the general attitude of society is that almost all individual risks should be covered collectively.

This philosophy is a dangerous one, both for the individual and for society as a whole. It ignores what social security and social insurance are really for: to protect and extend the freedom of the individual in order to ensure that a dignified life is still possible if, in old-age or as a result of sickness or other misfortune, he or she is left without any source of income. However, this philosophy leads to a situation where the individual must sacrifice an ever larger proportion of his income in taxes and in contributions to fund collective social security. The funding of social insurance is part of an ever-increasing process of redistribution, and as resources are channelled away from the private sector, there is a corresponding restriction in the individual's freedom to choose his or her own individual lifestyle, and that is not the only consequence. In the long term, this Welfare State philosophy has a paralysing effect on individual initiative and the willingness of the individual to help himself or herself, with all the negative consequences which this has for society as a whole.

As I said at the outset, for many countries, this is in practice not a problem. On the contrary, they would be glad to have such problems. However, no discussion of social insurance and social protection should ignore the mistakes which have been made. It is certainly easier to avoid mistakes at the outset than to try to correct them later on.

I would like to make one further point: the design and the cost of social insurance systems in the rich countries ultimately also affects the developing countries. If in our countries we make mistakes which adversely affect our economic performance, this in turn will reduce the possibilities for promoting economic development in the developing countries which is an absolute prerequisite for the development of social insurance. It would ultimately be a violation of the solidarity between the rich and the poorer countries, and of the overriding solidarity of the human community.

Mr. NYAMHOKYA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – As this is the first time I have taken the floor, I would like to use this opportunity to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General on the excellent Report he has brought before this session of the Conference. This Report, Social insurance and social protection, deals with very relevant issues which currently are being discussed in many countries, including Tanzania. It is for this reason, that I have decided to say a few things which are of great relevance to the workers I represent.

First and foremost, I welcome the fact that the Director-General of the ILO has chosen to include the question of social insurance systems in his Report. Back home this is a burning issue. Workers are asking many pertinent questions with regard to their involvement in the administration of the Social Security Fund, the continued validity of the use of the Fund's resources by the Government and the time lag between losing their jobs and receiving their final benefits from the Fund. It can be very frustrating for somebody without any other means of supporting himself and his family to spend more than six months chasing his own money from the Fund. It is for this reason that workers in Tanzania welcome the initiative taken by the ILO to render assistance to Tanzania with the view of changing the Fund into a pension scheme. We hope that the ILO experts will not confine themselves to dealing with the Government alone but will also find an early opportunity to consult the workers and especially their trade union representatives so that they are fully briefed on the situation.

Workers in Tanzania have other fund schemes besides the National Provident Fund. We have, for example, the fund scheme for local government workers called the Local Government Provident Fund, among others. The workers are of the opinion that these funds should all be transformed into pension schemes to enable workers who lose their jobs to receive direct and prompt financial assistance to alleviate their domestic problems and also to enable them to start some form of economic activity which could see them through during the period of hardship.

The Director-General's Report also touches upon the question of occupational safety and the health of the workers themselves. Workers in Tanzania find this topic very relevant especially now when there are workers losing their lives almost every day and others sustaining injuries for no other reason than some employers' greed for money. In this very competitive economic world, where the cost of production can make a difference in terms of the survival of an industry, the tendency or the credo has become to keep the cost of production low and maximize profit. In doing this many employers find excuses to cut down costs on safety and health aspects with total disregard to the health and safety of their labour force. This is not only unfair but also wrong and illegal. Unfortunately, many laws in Tanzania are outdated and impose very small fines to those who are responsible for the death of workers and in case of an injured worker his or her compensation is shamefully meagre. It is for this reason that we are pushing the Government quickly and without any further delays and excuses to bring laws before Parliament and the House of Representatives with a view to repealing the outdated and colonial laws, as the current situation demands. Employers, including the Government, should also be reminded of the fact that the productivity of an unhealthy worker, working in an environment which is unsafe and hazardous, is bound to be very low. Here also we call upon the ILO in its educational programmes to involve workers and employers so that the issues of occupational health and safety can be discussed seriously and problems identified with a view to finding their solutions.

Mr. ESAU (Workers' delegate, Namibia) – Allow me first and foremost to present our congratulations as Namibian workers to the President, the two Vice-Presidents and the Officers of the Conference on their elections. We wish them every success.

We would like to take this opportunity to extend our congratulations to Mr. Hansenne on his re-election as Director-General of the International Labour Office. We are certain that he will make every effort, by drawing upon his long experience and highly developed skills, to guide our Organization forward so that it can fulfil the aims and objectives spelled out in its Constitution.

The Report of the Director-General, Social insurance and social protection, focuses on the most relevant and important subject this year.

The Report rightly refers to the fact that "the presence of a reasonable social safety net for all individuals and households enlarges and strengthens the labour force of a country, adds to its capacity to promote growth and to accept change and underpins a greater degree of political and social stability".

Our country has been free of the yoke of colonialism for just three-and-a-half years. The economic and social situation inherited reflected the apartheid and discriminatory colonial system imposed upon Namibian workers. It will take the Namibian people decades and decades to dismantle the socio-political order left to us by the colonial minority Government of South Africa.

The Namibian authorities are presently in the process of establishing a social security system which we as workers regard as a step in the right direction.

We believe that a future social security system in Namibia will also make provision, in terms of benefits, to the many workers who are casually employed in the sectors covering domestic and farm work.

The high unemployment in our country is one of the major obstacles in the way of implementing an effective and efficient social security system. It is further aggravated by cut-backs in the numbers of workers in the various economic sectors of our country.

We are very concerned by the trend of unemployment which continues to rise because of these redundancies. This will take us further away from implementing an effective and efficient social security system. What is now important to us is the creation of employment to strengthen the social and economic base of our members. This in turn will also contribute to the setting up of an effective and efficient social security system and stimulate economic growth in our country.

Our federation is suffering from a lack of experience and skill in the execution of workers' education programmes in the sphere of social security and other programmes which are geared towards the dismantling of the apartheid-oriented socio-economic order. The National Union of Namibian Workers has managed to implement basic workers' education programmes to get across to its members the importance of trade unions and the principle of tripartism.

Further technical advisory services and assistance are needed from the ILO in the fields of social security and socio-economic programmes for the trade unions in order to effectively contribute towards the creation of an effective and efficient system of social security and protection in a new social order.

Disparity in the present social security and social protection system in our country is still reflected in the case of pensioners. This disparity in benefits should be eradicated, because it was based on the colour of the Namibian people. We hope that this will be replaced by a new social security system which will be a product of all the social partners in Namibia.

We believe that this session of the Conference will be a milestone for all working men and women in terms of the improvement of their working and living conditions, as well as their social improvement, in order to develop a better future for mankind as a whole.

In conclusion, we wish the session every success in meeting its significant aims and objectives.

Mr. LARSEN (representative of the International Confederation of Executive Staff) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Executive Staff, I would like to congratulate the President on his election at this session of the Conference. May I also compliment the Director-General on his choosing a topic for his Report which is more than ever relevant in a world dominated by recession.

It can rightfully be said that the matter of social insurance and social protection is one if not the major challenge of the 1990s due to the fact that economic growth in many parts of the world is stagnating. Unemployment is a major problem for all groups of the labour market in a large number of countries, often followed by the consequence of social exclusion which deprives a large number of individuals and families of the right to live a dignified and reasonable life.

In developing a decent system of social protection, all partners – governments, employers and workers – have specific responsibilities; so do managerial and executive staff who in companies as well as in community life act as leaders and are aware of the need to develop new practices regarding social protection.

To focus for a moment on one of the major problems: unemployment. The approach that we see today in many countries of the world is often to establish a passive system of paying out unemployment benefits for shorter or longer time periods. In many cases, after some time this leads to an exclusion from the labour market because the workers lose touch with the labour market. Consequently, valuable resources are lost; at the same time, persons lose a sense of identity which so often is connected to the work performed; this ultimately tends to break up family structures.

In order to maintain the labour resource, active measures should be taken to train workers for other jobs or functions because they are certainly more beneficial to the individual as well as to the society.

New policies and practices in this field can only be obtained by a strong and close cooperation between governments and employers and workers. Flexibility in work time and pay structures may be a consequence of these new practices, and the social partners should be willing to give up rigid structures for the common good without compromising on the established labour standards.

Social security and social protection are closely linked to the labour market since workers and employers finance such schemes directly or indirectly.

We believe that it is important to establish new and different work-life patterns. To take one example: most people work full time until retirement and then stop abruptly.

We recommend a gradual withdrawal from the labour market or a scheme of flexible retirement and we also recommend that universal guidelines should be set up for this purpose.

We ask the ILO to deal with that problem as one of the many that could break up the rigid structures of today and facilitate a better system suited to the individual employee.

It is also our wish that the ILO should make a strong and positive contribution to social development by looking at new ways of organizing work; that adds to the establishment of social protection and structures, since the two are strongly interconnected.

The only way progress can be made in this area is for the ILO to act forcefully by convening all partners of the labour market and governments in a debate on new guidelines in the field of social protection and working life. The responsibility falls on all of us.

In conclusion, I can assure you that the International Confederation of Executive Staff is willing to contribute to the important debate and analysis to which we have been invited by the excellent Report of the Director-General.

Mr. SLUNCIK (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Slovakia) – First of all, I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to the President on his election to this esteemed position at the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is indeed a great honour for the Slovak Employers' delegation to have the opportunity to attend this distinguished gathering. And it is a great pleasure for me, personally, to deliver this speech.

In the framework of worldwide trends characterized by state and legal movements in various societies based on intensive negotiations, the separation between the Czech and Slovak Republics dates to 1 January 1993. It has enabled Slovakia to complete its emancipation by acquiring international and legal sovereignty.

Transition from the former Federation towards two sovereign republics was characterized by high political culture, organization, searching and following the framework of constitutionality and peace. In order to continue peaceful and fair relationships between the two republics, 28 intergovernmental or sectoral agreements concerning key relations between the republics were adopted on a bilateral level. These agreements were ratified by the Parliaments of both republics.

Slovakia is a typical Central European country. Its geographical and geopolitical location has played a significant role in its history. The cultural and political interests of many neighbouring nations have influenced its development. We continue to tackle the deformations that accumulated over the decades. Slovakia continues in the same direction that was forged by the passing of Communism in 1989. This is the direction of political, economic and social reconstruction, by which Slovakia wants to form a democratic society with a functioning market economy, social achievements and a rich and developing culture.

The direction of our country is a direction to the traditional values of West European civilization – Christian traditions based on three principal social values: freedom, equality and solidarity. Slovakia's economic programme is in step with a market economy based on the development and protection of private ownership and freedom of enterprise. At the same time the State is expected to ensure a healthy currency, address social policy and create a clear legislative and legal environment. The basic pillars are and will remain price and market liberalization and the opening of the economy to foreign capital. The tripartite General Agreement for the year 1993 confirms this development.

Since this is the first time I have spoken here on behalf of the employers of the Slovak Republic, allow me to introduce the Confederation of Industry of the Slovak Republic as the leading representative of Slovak employers. The Confederation is an organization which, since 4 May 1990, has picked up where its predecessor left off in 1950, when it was forcefully dissolved by the totalitarian system. The original activity of the central Association of Slovak Industry dates back to 1920, when Slovak industrialists and entrepreneurs gathered together. The Confederation associates legal and physical persons in the sphere of industry doing business on the territory of Slovakia, regardless of the type of ownership. Over 300 industrial enterprises which employ almost 400,000 employees, are members of the Confederation. The Confederation's mission is to associate its members, to coordinate their activities aimed at creating conditions for a dynamic development of industry, and to defend the collective and individual interests of its members. As an employers' organization, the Confederation actively participates in tripartite bargaining.

The Employers' delegation of Slovakia highly appreciates the Director-General's Report. In this context it is very important for the role of employers to be substantially strengthened and for them to continue participating in the transformation process of Central and Eastern European countries.

Focusing on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation, we support the new modalities of multilateral technical cooperation and their impact on the ILO activities and within the Nordic United Nations project; we also support the democratization process through tripartism and social dialogue.

Slovakian employers can play an important role in the functioning of the so-called "triangle of influence", namely, the donor country, the ILO and the recipient country. Where, on the one hand, Slovakia can be the recipient of a project, on the other hand, Slovakia can give technical assistance to less developed or less advanced countries.

On the subject of technical cooperation, I would like to draw your attention to the problem of the conversion of military production in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. I think we need to recognize the problem, and to seek solutions through technical cooperation.

In conclusion, let me express my thanks to the representatives of the International Labour Organization and the International Organization of Employers who visited Slovakia some weeks ago and gave us useful advice for our future work and collaboration.

I wish the Conference every success.

Original French: Mr. SOW (Employers' delegate, Senegal) – First of all, I would like to convey to the President my most heartfelt congratulations on his election.

The new term of office entrusted to Mr. Hansenne also gives me an opportunity to pay tribute to a man who has placed his stamp on our agency over the difficult years we have gone through, years which have been marked by a profound crisis in most international organizations.

The 80th Session of the International Labour Conference now coming to its conclusion is being held at a time when throughout the world economic, political and social upheaval is taking place at an unprecedented pace.

Africa, in particular, is stricken by a plethora of ills, disease, famine, war, political convulsion, economic crisis and its myriad consequences are causing our populations to lose hope while our foreign partners are nurturing increasing distrust.

In social terms, the essential values upon which our societies were created are in jeopardy.

This situation is persisting and is placing our enterprises and the people who work in them, and even our States in grave danger.

Part I of the Director-General's Report emphasizes the crisis in social security schemes. I would like to dwell on this crucial question.

My country, Senegal, is no exception to this adverse trend. Our social protection scheme is built on a number of agencies; the Institution for Retirement Insurance of Senegal (IPRES), the Social Security Fund and the Sickness Insurance Institutions (IPM).

The first of these is responsible for managing the retirement scheme for all workers and employers.

The second one manages family allowances and occupational accident benefits and also runs a hospital centre, the Traumatology and Orthopaedic Centre.

The Sickness Insurance Institutions reimburse, fully or in part, medical, pharmaceutical, surgical and hospitalization costs.

These institutions are seriously concerned about their ability to survive because of the combination of various factors: the macroeconomic policies introduced under structural adjustment programmes (mainly industrial and fiscal policies, and the hasty liberalization of our economy), have led to a major upheaval. Thus a number of firms are in difficulty, others have disappeared, entailing massive losses in jobs, especially in an already seriously straitened industrial sector. Investment has dropped in unprecedented dimensions, while the dwindling of stable resources leaves little hope for recovery in the immediate future. The informal sector is increasing at an exponential rate, to the detriment of the formal sector, and the number of workers retiring continues to increase.

In short, the number of contributors is falling, resulting in the levelling off of and even a drop in the resources of these institutions, whereas the number of beneficiaries and the volume of benefits are constantly increasing. Thus the deficit of these agencies is continuing to rise.

This situation cannot fail to be a source of concern because it is a patiently built edifice which is now being jeopardized.

Firms facing crisis on a day-by-day basis are not in a position to bear an increase in their contributions, which would restrict their competitivity.

A new challenge is thus facing the three elements which make up tripartism, namely the State, employers' organizations and workers' organizations. The Director-General has rightly said, in speaking of shared responsibilities in the name of the principle of solidarity, that the basic equilibrium conditioning the survival of these social institutions must be maintained.

This solidarity which is so necessary will remain a dead letter if the partners of day-to-day life do not respect the fundamental principle of tripartism to which they have subscribed.

I would also like to refer to some of the other themes in the Report of the Director-General.

In Senegal, as elsewhere, employment has become a major concern. Already the economic crisis is jeopardizing existing jobs, at a time when the number of young people entering productive life continues to increase and when the anaemic economic machine can offer few new possibilities. This grave situation, fraught will all kinds of problems, demands that the social partners, the public authorities, workers' and employers' organizations remain in constant dialogue.

The National Employers' Council of Senegal in 1987 proposed to its partners the organization of a dialogue through a draft social covenant to act as a framework for dialogue and the search for solutions to problems in our enterprises. Furthermore, it signed an employment-training agreement with the State with a view to matching training with employment, increasing productivity performance and reabsorbing unemployment.

With the help of the ILO, the Council managed to set up a management training centre intended to foster a spirit of entrepreneurship and to raise awareness about safety at work.

The ambitions of employers like ourselves are immense, but the limited nature of our resources is a handicap.

That is why we appreciate the assistance provided by the ILO and the IOE in our search for solutions to our problems.

The restricted nature of the means of our countries make it necessary for the various social partners, the State, employers and workers to be aware of the vital need to avoid waste and to concentrate their efforts on finding a solution to the problems of business.

Because strong and progressive business will determine the fate of our society.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. Gray) – We have a request for a right of reply from Mr. Hernández Valle, Workers' adviser and substitute delegate of Peru, to the intervention of Mr. Antonioli Vázquez, Minister of Labour, Peru.

Before giving the floor to Mr. Valle, I would remind him that he must confine his remarks to one precise point in the intervention of Minister Vázquez and that the time-limit for his intervention and right of reply is two minutes.

Original Spanish: Mr. HERNANDEZ VALLE (Workers' adviser and substitute delegate, Peru) – On behalf of the workers of Peru and the CGTP, we wish to express to the President and the Director-General our congratulations and wishes for success in your important work. The Government of Peru has set out to abolish social security in order to promote influential groups which have links with the Government, to the detriment of the vast majority of workers who will not have access to the costly pension funds. These fund administrations enjoy government support and to have any entitlement to a pension from these bodies, men need to reach the age of 65, although life expectancy in Peru is only 60. The same Government has suggested that the Shining Path was responsible for the assassination of our former General Secretary Pedro Huilca. Our present General Secretary was questioned for eight hours by "faceless" judges, on suspicion of complicity in that assassination. The stage has thus been set for the elimination of trade union and popular leaders. There is terrorism of every kind in Peru, including state terrorism. Peru is ruled by a dictatorship. We are at this session of the Conference thanks to donations from the workers of Peru, although the Government has done its utmost to prevent our attendance.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Czech Republic

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of the Czech Republic, lodged by the Trade Union Association of Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia (OSCMS).

2. The objecting organization complained that the Government had failed to consult the OSCMS on the composition of the Workers' delegation at the Conference. In spite of a statement in Parliament by the acting president of the OSCMS, a member of Parliament, drawing attention to Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, the Government allowed the Workers' delegation to be arbitrarily chosen by only one trade union organization, the Czecho-Moravian Chamber of Trade Unions (CS KOS), heedless of the trade union pluralism in the country.

3. In a written statement made to the Committee at its request, Mr. Zdenek Venera, Government delegate of the Czech Republic to the Conference, stated that the Government had fully complied with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution since it had nominated the delegation in agreement and after consultation with the Workers' organizations which were considered to be the most representative and were represented in the tripartite Council of Economic and Social Agreement. These were the CS KOS, with 4,015,000 members and the Confederation of Art and Culture (KUK), with 72,140 members.

4. Besides those two organizations, there were some other central trade unions, which included the objecting organization and which had not provided the Government with any real evidence on such aspects as its numerical strength, structure, and territorial or branch representation. The Government was aware of requests by such organizations to be represented on the tripartite Council referred to above. It was ready to study their inclusion in consultation with the various trade union organizations.

5. The Committee observed that the Government had carried out consultations with the organizations represented on the national tripartite bodies and had appointed the Workers' delegation in agreement with the CS KOS which, according to the information available, was the most representative Workers' organization in the Czech Republic and decided not to uphold the objection. At the same time, the Committee took note of the Government's intention to consider the representativity of other organizations desiring inclusion in the national consultation machinery and to find a solution in consultation with the organizations concerned.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Worker's delegate of Lithuania

6. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lithuania, lodged by the Lithuanian Workers' Union (LWU).

7. The objecting organization, which claimed to be the most active and representative Workers' organization in Lithuania, stated that it had not been invited by the Government to participate in the consultations for the nomination of the Workers' delegation to the Conference. The Government had been evasive with respect to the LWU, by continuing to say that it would probably not send a delegation due to financial difficulties. When it finally decided to appoint the delegate, the LWU was not informed. The LWU concluded by appealing for the condemnation of the Government's action so as to influence its compliance with ILO standards and procedures.

8. In a written communication sent to the Committee at its request, Mr. Theodoras Medaiskis, Minister of Social Security and Head of the Delegation of Lithuania, stated that the Lithuanian trade unions had unified themselves into five central organizations: the Free Trade Union Centre (14 affiliated members), the Free Trade Union Unification (10 affiliated members), the Independent Trade Union – "Bendrija" (Community), the Workers' Union and the Labour Federation. The first two central organizations had over 360,000 members, or 4/5 of all trade union members.

9. The Government had held consultations concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate to the Conference in the framework of an agreement concluded with trade unions in February 1993. It appealed to the trade unions to agree on a single delegate. At the meeting at which the selection of the Workers' delegate took place, two of the smaller organizations mentioned on the above list were invited but did not attend. Shortage of funds prevented the recommendation of more than one representative from the Workers and one from the Employers. For the same reason, the decision on Lithuania's participation in the 80th Session of the Conference was delayed until 31 May 1993.

10. The Committee noted the information provided by the Government on the organizations considered to be most representative and on the consultations that took place with those organizations for the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lithuania to the Conference. As the objecting organization had not provided any data in support of its claim to be the most representative organization, the Committee decided that there was no ground for upholding the objection.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of El Salvador

11. The Committee had before it two objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of El Salvador. One was from the "Intergremial de Trabajadores", which grouped together the "Unión Obrero Campesina" (UNOC), the "Central de Trabajadores Salvadoreños" (CTS), the "Central General de Trabajadores" (CGT), the "Asociación General de Empleados Públicos y Municipales" (AGEPYM), and the "Unidad Nacional de los Trabajadores Salvadoreños" (UNTS). It represented the Workers in the "Foro para la Concertación Económica" in El Salvador. The other objection was made by the "Federación de Asociaciones y Sindicatos Independientes de El Salvador" (FEASIES).

12. The objecting organizations indicated that the Government had nominated the Workers' delegate of El Salvador without undertaking the consultations provided for by Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the ILO. The person nominated to represent the Workers was not identified with the trade union movement and did not represent the interests of the Workers. The objecting organizations concluded by requesting the rejection of the credentials of the said delegate.

13. By a letter dated 9 June 1993, the Chairman of the Credentials Committee transmitted to the Government delegation of El Salvador the objections as well as a request for further information. Despite a reminder of 14 June 1993 sent by the Secretariat of the Committee, no reply was received from the Government.

14. The Committee noted that it was not able to examine the objection in accordance with its mandate under Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. In such circumstances, and although it did not propose invalidation, the Committee considered that there were serious reasons to doubt the representativity of the Workers' delegate of El Salvador. In this regard, the Committee pointed out that the credentials sent by the Government did not mention either the name of the organization to which the Workers' delegate belonged, or the organizations which had agreed to his nomination.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde

15. The Committee had before it two objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde, one submitted by the "Uniao Nacional dos Trabalhadores de Cabo Verde Central Sindical" (UNTC-CS), which was supported by the other objection, lodged by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

16. The UNTC-CS referred to the objection made at the 79th Session of the Conference, which claimed that the organization to which the titular delegate belonged (the Council of Free Trade Unions (CCSL), now called the "Cape Verde Confederation of Free Trade Unions") was not representative on a national scale. The UNTC-CS recalled the Government's reply to the Committee at that Session, including the Committee's reference to the need "for the parties to provide reliable data" [in connection with representativity]. The Government, however, had refused to carry out the survey that the UNTC-CS had requested and had once again nominated the CCSL to represent the Workers at the Conference.

17. The ICFTU added that the UNTC-CS was an organization with ten organizations affiliated to it in six islands of the Cape Verde archipelago. But the CCSL only had members on one island, and mainly in the public sector so that it could not be considered as representative on a national scale. In addition, the UNTC-CS had 13,000 members, of whom 10,000 were in full-time work, the total of full-time workers being 25,000. The ICFTU concluded that the Government ought to have designated the UNTC-CS to represent the Workers of Cape Verde at the Conference in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution and that the credentials of the Workers' delegate should accordingly be invalidated.

18. In a written statement made to the Committee at its request, Mr. Eurico Correia Monteiro, Secretary of State and Head of the Delegation of Cape Verde to the Conference, provided the following information: there had previously been a single central organization, imposed by law, but with the establishment of democracy and pluralism freedom of association had been proclaimed. Under the new rules, the UNTC-CS had been required to register itself as a central organization and the CCSL had been established in this way. The Government had invited the Workers' organizations to agree on the nomination of its delegates for the Conference. The CCSL had responded positively, whereas the UNTC-CS had stated that it would be prepared to attend the consultations only after a survey had been carried out to determine which organization was the most representative. The Government had considered that it would not be reasonable to carry out such a survey in view of the resources that would be involved without any guarantee of success; the number of members fluctuated and the survey would have to be repeated each year.

19. The Government stated that the CCSL was representative in a number of islands, in particular in the four with the largest population and had trade unions in various branches affiliated to it – in both the public sector and the private. Both the existing confederations in Cape Verde could be said to be representative according to the available data on numbers of affiliated trade unions, economic sectors represented, presence in the islands, negotiating power, capacity to mobilize, etc. However, because of the UNTC-CS's intransigence the Government had not been able to achieve a consensus.

20. The Committee also had before it a communication from the Workers' delegate accredited to the Conference, Mr. José Manual Voz, Secretary General of the "Cape Verde Confederation of Free Trade Unions", who denied the information given by the UNTC-CS alleging non-representativity of the CCSL on a national scale. According to the data transmitted to the ILO and the ICFTU, the CCSL was established on a national scale, represented the majority of workers in the country and comprised nine trade unions. The 13,000 members which the UNTC-CS claimed to have should be seen in the context of a working population of 88,000 persons. In addition, the UNTC-CS had opposed any kind of dialogue.

21. The Committee noted the efforts undertaken to arrive at a compromise on the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde. It pointed out, however, that any assessment of the representativity of those organizations should be based on objective data, which could be obtained in various ways, such as a survey, elections, or books or registers of the organizations.

22. The Committee noted the difference between the information on representativity submitted by the objecting organizations, on the one side, and by the Government and the organization of the Workers' delegate whose credentials had been challenged, on the other, which prevented it from taking any position on the subject. It once again stressed the need for interested parties to provide reliable data. In the light of the above considerations, and despite the doubts expressed within the Committee on the representative character of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde, the Committee decided not to uphold the objections.

Objection to the credentials of the delegation of Zaire

23. The Committee had before it a document constituting an objection to the credentials of the delegation of Zaire, which had been lodged on behalf of a delegation claiming to be the legitimate delegation of Zaire to the present session of the Conference. The objection was accompanied by a letter to the President of the Conference requesting deferment of the Conference's "discussions in plenary relating to the examination and adoption" of the report on the representation of Zaire (Second Report of the Credentials Committee, paragraphs 12 to 20, Provisional Record, No. 14, pp. 14/46 and 14/47).

24. According to the objectors, this report was contradictory. On the one hand, the Committee noted that there were no criteria for reaching firm conclusions concerning the conflicting claims relating to the government of Zaire; on the other, by taking into account the credentials submitted by the Permanent Mission of Zaire in Geneva, the Committee had recognized the credentials of Mr. Kishwe Maya, in the capacity of Minister of Labour, Manpower and Social Security of Zaire. Those credentials could in any event only have been taken into account if there had been no delegates from Zaire of a higher rank than the Permanent Representative in Geneva. The objectors concluded that there was ample evidence on which the Committee – following past precedents – could have determined that the "Gouvernement de Transition" was the only legitimate government of Zaire; they claimed, in particular, that it had been recognized as such by the whole of the international community, by all governments of the other ILO member States and by the United Nations. Various documents, mainly relevant to the constitutional situation in Zaire, were annexed to the objection.

25. As far as the substance of the objection was concerned, the Committee considered that the absence in it of any concrete evidence concerning the position of the international community with respect to the legitimate government of Zaire, confirmed the Committee's earlier conclusion that the evidence at present available was insufficient to enable firm conclusions to be made in this respect. The Committee pointed out that, in accordance with the Standing Orders of the Conference, its Second Report had been submitted only for the purpose of being noted by the Conference and did not contain any opinion on the contents of the credentials submitted by the Permanent Mission of Zaire.

26. The Committee accordingly decided to confirm its previous conclusions set out in the Second Report and not to uphold the objection. At the same time, it wished to reiterate that this position did not imply recognition of the government whose representatives were included in those credentials nor, consequently, did it imply any opinion as to the correctness of the designation of Minister of Labour, Manpower and Social Security given by the credentials to one of the delegates.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Algeria

27. The Committee had before it an objection presented by the Officers of the Employers' Group of the Conference to the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Algeria.

28. According to the objectors, the "Confédération générale des opérateurs économiques algériens" (CGOEA) had proposed the names of the delegate and advisers to represent the Employers of Algeria to the Conference. The Government had not given effect to the proposal concerning the titular Employers' delegate; consultations had not been held in spite of an announcement by the Ministry of Labour that a meeting would take place for that purpose; and the Government had only allowed the CGOEA to have two advisers with expenses paid. However, the CGOEA represented 14,000 employers in all sectors of the economy and was by far the most representative organization in Algeria of the employer community. The organization to which Mr. Mustapha Mekideche, the Employers' delegate, belonged represented only one small section of the public sector. For these reasons, the Conference should reject the credentials of the Employers' delegate.

29. In a written communication sent to the Committee at its request, Mr. Tahar Hamdi, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs and Head of the delegation of Algeria to the Conference, indicated that since the constitutional reforms in 1989, there existed trade union pluralism in Algeria with respect both to workers and employers and that the criteria defined in legislation to evaluate the representativity were the period of existence (six months of legal existence) and of membership. Organizations which represented at least 20 per cent of employers in the respective districts were considered representative at the different levels.

30. According to the communication, there were at present in Algeria four employers' organizations: "L'Union Nationale des Entrepreneurs Publics" (UNEP); the "Confédération Nationale du Patronat Algérien" (CNPA), the "Confédération Générale des Opérateurs Economique Algériens" (CGOEA) and the "Confédération Algérienne du Patronat" (CAP). According to the statistics of the "Caisse Nationale de la Sécurité Sociale", the organization to which the Employers' delegate belonged, UNEP, represented between 70 per cent and 80 per cent of the national economic activity, employing 1,500,000 workers in all sectors and accounted for 78,000 million dinars of the GNP while the sector represented by the CGOEA employed 370,000 workers and accounted for 22,000 million dinars of the GNP. Furthermore, according to a survey of the labour force made by the National Statistical Office, the public sector employed 53.22 per cent of the population.

31. Certain organizations had in fact withdrawn their affiliation to the CGOEA. The most important of them was the "Union Générale des Entrepreneurs Algériens" (UGEA). Because of the internal difficulties that the CGOEA was going through, the Government had had to include the UGEA in last year's delegation to the Conference. However, until an agreed mechanism was established with the organizations for participation in regional or international tripartite meetings, the Government had sought not to exclude any legally constituted organizations and had nominated as Employers' advisers of Algeria to the Conference three representatives of the CGOEA, paying the required expenses.

32. During the Committee's examination of this case, the objectors provided complementary information consisting, in particular, of statistics on UNEP, provided by the CGOEA, and a copy of two letters from the UGEA in Algiers; the first was an undated letter to the Ministry of Labour expressing surprise at the nomination of a representative of UNEP as titular Workers' delegate of Algeria; the second, dated 13 June 1993 and addressed to the President of the Conference, stated that the UGEA continued to be a founder member of the CGOEA.

33. At the Committee's invitation, Mr. Abdel Hamid M. Semichi, Ambassador and Permanent Representative of Algeria in Geneva and Mrs. Fifi Abdelouahab, Director of Legal Studies and Cooperation in the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, made the following statements: The Ambassador referred to the Minister's reply, explaining that after 30 years of a centralized economy, the private sector of the economy was increasing in importance but had not yet become predominant. The composition of the Employers' delegation reflected this reality. In addition, the person who was at the source of the present objection had been accredited as adviser and substitute delegate in the Employers' delegation had accepted that nomination and was taking an active part in the Conference in that capacity. In fact, the objection was part of a systematic attack against the public sector. The allegations in it were excessive and could easily be refuted. The Government was prepared to allow an impartial observer from the ILO to come to Algeria to study the situation. Mrs. Abdelouahab stated that the statistics provided by the objectors were tendentious. They sought to cast doubt on the present representativity in the economic sectors. The union movement, of both the Workers and the Employers, was in a process of complete change and the law on the exercise of union rights was only three years old. The Minister of Labour had convened all the organizations for consultations and had received in his office the president of the CGOEA to discuss the composition of the Employers' delegation to the Conference. Following this meeting, it was decided to include representatives of the CGOEA in the Employers' delegation. The UGEA had indeed withdrawn its affiliation from the CGOEA as was shown by a letter from its president to the Minister of Labour of February 1992, of which a copy was given to the Committee. The Government had had no communication from the UGEA since then, until the letter of June 1993, produced by the objectors. Finally, UNEP did not represent either officials or the Administration but rather enterprises in the public sector of the economy. Those enterprises were now subject to the normal commercial laws, and thus capable of being placed into liquidation, and in the context of the present gradual move towards a market economy, would be able to issue shares.

34. The Committee pointed out that the objection had been lodged by the Officers of the Employers' Group, rather than by an individual member of the Employers' delegation of Algeria. It noted that according to the statistics referred to by the Government, the organization to which the Employers' delegate belonged, represented the majority of the employers in Algeria where the public sector represented the greater part of the productive activity of the country. However, according to the objection, the CGOEA was the organization most representative of the employers of Algeria. For the assessment of the relative importance of employers' organizations in the public sector and those in the private sector, the Committee considered relevant the statement by the Permanent Court of International Justice in its Advisory Opinion No. 1 that "the most representative organizations ... are ... those which best represent the employers and the workers respectively".

35. The Committee observed that, in spite of all the information provided by both the objectors and the Government, certain aspects of the question had not been clarified, such as whether or not the UGEA formed part of the CGOEA and whether or not the affiliates of UNEP were all genuine enterprises, although belonging to the public sector. However, because of the doubts that could arise with respect to those specific aspects, the Committee considered that it was not possible to conclude that, at the present time, the Employers' delegation as a whole was not representative of the employers in Algeria. As the Government had at least not excluded any sector of the economy from the Employers' delegation, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

36. The Committee noted with interest the Government's intention to establish an appropriate mechanism for determining the composition of tripartite delegations to international conferences. Considering the changing relationship between the public and the private sectors, and the consequences of those changes in the context of employers in Algeria, the Committee felt that this mechanism should provide for comprehensive consultations which would ensure that at all stages the Conference delegations effectively represented the employers of Algeria.

Late objections

37. On 17 June 1993 the Committee received an objection from the "Organisação Nacional dos Trabalhàdores de Sao Tomé et Principe – Central Syndical" (ONTSTP-CS) concerning the Workers' delegate of Sao Tome and Principe.

38. The name of this delegate appeared in the Revised Provisional List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of 10 June 1993. This communication was received after the end of the 72-hour time limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Conference Standing Orders. The Committee considered that it was not receivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision.

39. On 18 June 1993 the Committee received an objection transmitted by fax and dated 25 May 1993 from the Papua New Guinea Trade Union Congress (PNGTUC) concerning the Workers' delegate of Papua New Guinea.

40. The name of this delegate appeared in the Provisional List of Delegations published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 2 June 1993. This communication was received after the end of the 72-hour time limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Conference Standing Orders. The Committee considered that it was not receivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision.

Communication from the Permanent Mission of the Republic of Korea

41. Following the publication of its Second Report, the Committee received a communication from the Permanent Mission of the Republic of Korea in Geneva drawing its attention, inter alia, to a summary in paragraph 7 of its report (Provisional Record, No. 14, p.14/45) that could be misleading. The summary noted that the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ) had referred to a refusal by the Government of the Republic of Korea to recognize the Korean Federation of Press Unions (KFPU). However, the IFJ had also indicated that its complaint in this connection had been lodged last year, adding that the KFPU had been legally recognized (on 18 January 1993) following a Supreme Court decision.

Payment of travel and subsistence expenses of delegations

42. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group, signed by its Secretary, Mr. Costas Kapartis, wishing to register the protest of the Employers' group at the number of governments which had not respected their obligation under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution to bear travel and subsistence expenses for their Employers' delegations. Eight governments had not offered any financial support at all to their Employers' delegations. Many other Employers' representatives could not take part in the Conference for lack of financial support. Three of them had communicated their strong disappointment with this situation.

43. The communication added that the problem took dimensions beyond the fulfilment of the constitutional obligations of member States. It interfered with tripartism, a more balanced composition of delegations and the smooth functioning of the Conference; it was therefore necessary for measures to be taken to improve the situation and for the Officers of the ILO Governing Body to be informed of the results.

44. The Committee also received a communication from three advisers of a country who said that their government had not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of any of the three Workers' advisers that it had nominated and from one regional trade union organization which stated that the government had refused to pay more than half of the travel and subsistence expenses of a Workers' adviser. In this respect, the Committee noted that the delegation of the latter country had ordered the name of the adviser to be deleted from the List of Delegates.

45. On the same subject, the Committee drew attention to paragraph 18 of its First Report (Provisional Record, No. 10, page 10/26) which had recalled the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusted that this obligation would be respected throughout the duration of the Conference.

46. At the same time, the Committee once again recalled the provisions in the Conference Standing Orders that set out its mandate, namely Articles 5 and 26, which did not include in its functions the consideration of objections based on non-compliance by a member State with its obligations under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution. The Committee's action was therefore limited to taking note of the communications received.

47. In response to the request made by the Credentials Committee of the 79th Session of the Conference in its Fourth Report that the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism to evaluate the extent to which the obligations under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution were being complied with should be examined by the competent bodies of the ILO (79th Session, Provisional Record, No. 26, page 26/5), the Committee was informed that the Office had highlighted the call made to that effect in the Memorandum for the Conference and had included a space on that subject in the Form for Credentials which had been sent to governments along with the Memorandum. The governments of 51 member States had responded to this initiative when they issued the credentials of their delegations. Forty-four of those governments had declared that they paid the expenses of the whole of their delegations, and six had said that they only covered part of their delegations, normally paying the expenses of a specific number of non-governmental advisers.

48. In taking note of the Office's initiative, the Committee urged governments to include the above information in the credentials that they sent in order to assist the study of the extent to which Article 13, paragraph 2, of the Constitution was being respected.

49. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Fourth item on the agenda: Prevention of major industrial accidents

Report of the Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents

1. The Committee on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 2 June 1993. It was originally composed of 136 members (55 Government members, 40 Employers' members and 41 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 328 votes, each Employers' member 451 votes and each Workers' member 440 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified several times during this session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman: Dr. Payaman J. Simanjuntak (Government member, Indonesia);

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. P. Campbell (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Ms. S. Mayman (Workers' member, Australia);

Reporter: Mr. T. Seymour (Government member, United States).

3. At its fourth sitting the Committee appointed members of a Committee Drafting Committee composed as follows: Ms. C. Clémente (Government member of France); Mr. G. Simonnet (Employers' member of France); Ms. S. Mayman (Workers' member of Australia); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee had before it Reports IV (2A) and IV (2B) prepared by the Office for a second discussion by the Conference of the fourth item on the agenda: "The Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents". The proposed Convention and the Recommendation submitted by the Office were contained in Report IV (2B).

5. The Committee held 12 sittings.

General discussion

6. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, Dr. K. Kogi, welcomed the delegates at the first sitting of the Committee and proceeded with the election of its Chairman. Thereafter, he recalled briefly the documents since the first discussion in 1992. Following the first discussion, the Conference Committee resolved to amend the title of the proposed new instruments to the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents. The Office had received replies from 57 member States and, in addition, replies from seven member States were received too late for inclusion in Report IV (2A): these were available to members of the Committee who wished to consult them. The proposed Convention and Recommendation contained in Report IV (2B) had been drawn up by the Office to reflect the observations received. The Representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that some drafting changes had been introduced to the Conclusions which were adopted by the Conference at its 79th Session in 1992 for the sake of clarity. He also drew particular attention to the several modifications introduced by the Office to the texts of the proposed instruments. The first such modification dealt with the terms "major hazard installation" and "threshold quantity" which were defined without reference to a specific, limited physical area where the said quantity of the hazardous substance is retained. Since this lack of reference to a specific physical area could create a legal problem, the definition of the term "threshold quantity" was altered. The second change introduced concerned the rearrangement of the order of the definitions under Article 1. As the definition of the term "near miss" in this Article was retained, attention was drawn to the need to consider the consistency of this definition with that of a "major accident" and reference was made accordingly to the Office proposal in Report IV (2A) regarding the need for the alignment of the two definitions. Thirdly, the text of Article 3 concerning the progressive implementation of preventive measures was broadened to include "other interested parties who may be affected" in order to bring the text in line with Article 2, paragraph 2, and with Article 4, paragraph 1. The fourth modification concerned Article 17, on the siting of major hazard installations in which a new reference to appropriate measures for existing installations had been incorporated. The fifth modification dealt with Articles 19 and 20 on the rights and duties of workers and their representatives and aimed at clarifying the meaning of the term "control" by the introduction of a better formulation with regard to controlling developments likely to lead to a major accident. The last modification was the deletion in paragraph 3 of the Recommendation of the reference to "reviewed, revised and updated" versions of the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, published in 1991. This was necessary to avoid the difficulty arising from the fact that future revisions of the Code would imply changes in the substance of the Recommendation without resorting to the normal standard-setting procedures of the ILO. Within this context, the representative of the Secretary-General referred to the suggestions made by a few governments regarding the addition of some relevant provisions that could give important means of action to be pursued by member States. He drew particular attention to the proposal made by the Government of the United States which was reproduced in Report IV (2A) and recalled that the proposal was similar to an amendment submitted to the Conference Committee last year by the Government of the United States. He also outlined the current activities of the Office, with particular reference to the work on chemical safety, policy guidance, information exchange and the implementation of technical cooperation projects.

7. The spokesperson of the Employers' members expressed the hopes that the Committee would work to reach an agreement on a Convention that would contribute to the prevention of major industrial accidents. Since the first-year discussion, the Employers' members supported the drafting of an international instrument that would be flexible to accommodate the various systems on the prevention of major industrial accidents and that was linked to basic principles governing their prevention. The text drawn up as a result of the first year discussion contained a number of provisions on which the Employers' members had voiced very serious reservations and which needed to be suitably re-examined prior to supporting the adoption of the proposed instrument. The provisions referred to included the concept of near misses, the siting of major hazard installations and the Recommendation, in particular its linkage to the ILO Code of Practice on the subject. He also reiterated the continued opposition of the Employers' members to the extension of the Convention into areas beyond the conventional industrial operations, such as biological hazards. Since Conventions become binding instruments when ratified, they must not impose obligations so burdensome as to slow progress. They should be universally applicable, simple and flexible with due regard to the differences in the levels and conditions of development in the various countries. Progress would be achieved step by step, and this Convention would be one such step in the direction of preventing major industrial accidents liable to harm people at work and those in the vicinity of the accident. An all-embracing standard of excellence which could not be ratified was of little use.

8. The spokesperson of the Workers' members welcomed a Convention and a Recommendation that prevented major industrial accidents while cautioning that in its present draft, the Convention created geographical limits on coverage, in terms of "major hazard installations", rather than coverage defined by the risk of accident in relation to major hazards. She pointed out two recent examples of incidents that the Workers' members believed should be taken into account by the Convention. The first was the near miss at a nuclear plant, and the second was a recent disastrous fire at a toy factory. The exclusion of transport from the scope of the Convention was in conflict with its preamble which stressed the need for a comprehensive and a coherent approach to the prevention of major industrial accidents, and she also referred to the Chemicals Convention (No. 170), 1990, which covered transport. The spokesperson also stated that a Convention with foresight as well as hindsight should cover biological hazards and should be in line with the 1990 annual report of the Director-General of the ILO which linked environmental concerns with working conditions. She further requested a clarification by the Office concerning what the Workers' members viewed as significant textual changes appearing in Report IV (2B) on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents.

9. The Government member of the United States stated that the first year discussion resulted in a very good draft Convention and Recommendation. It was important for member States to use a systematic approach in preventing major industrial accidents. The basic elements of this approach, which the Convention and Recommendation employed, had to be retained. In preventing major industrial accidents, outside emergency resources and manpower, such as fire brigades, should be relied upon by the major hazard installation. The prevention of property loss and the protection of human lives and the environment were equally important.

10. The Government member of Denmark speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the European Communities (EC), stated that the text prepared by the Office for discussion at the 80th Session provided a satisfactory basis for finalizing the Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. The instrument should be flexible in order to enable its ratification and should be compatible with other international instruments in the field such as the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents adopted by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe. The EC countries were concerned with the difficulties associated with practical implementation of measures aimed at preventing major accidents especially as different systems existed in different countries and emphasized that the effort involved coordination between more than one agency in the same country. To support the implementation of major hazard regulations, the Commission of the European Communities had set up a special committee composed of representatives from the competent authorities of the member countries. For a successful implementation of the Convention, the ILO could step up its advisory services already provided to some countries and promote collaboration between countries, an effort with which the EC countries and others could assist.

11. The Government member of Canada strongly supported the coverage by the Convention of the safety of the public and the environment and stated that the instrument should be simple, flexible and free from details.

12. The Government member of China supported the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation on the prevention of major industrial accidents. Despite its importance, the term "near miss" should be deleted since such an incident could not be notified by the employer. He stated that the reference to the ILO Code of Practice in the Preamble of the Convention and the Recommendation was important, and suggested the replacement of paragraph 3 of the Recommendation by a text containing the relevant key provisions.

13. The Government member of Australia supported the text of the proposed Convention and Recommendation. He considered that transport, nuclear and military installations should not be automatically excluded from the scope of the Convention. He observed that biological hazards should also be covered and that the Convention as currently drafted was capable of dealing with biological organisms while leaving the determination of applicable criteria to each member State. The requirement to submit information on "near misses" was essential in preventing major industrial accidents. Provision for liability for the consequence of a major accident was also important in preventing damage. The need for the proposed instruments to be flexible and to facilitate their application among member States was emphasized.

14. The Government member of Japan emphasized that the establishment of a system for the prevention of major industrial accidents was important for the protection of workers. The instrument should take the form of a Recommendation and should be flexible enough to allow its application by different national laws and practices. It should focus on the protection of workers while referring to matters relating to the protection of the public and the environment as elements to be taken into consideration.

15. In response to a query raised by the spokesperson of the Workers' members regarding textual changes in Report IV (2B), the representative of the Secretary-General explained that such changes were made in accordance with Article 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

16. The Committee agreed to despatch a message to Mr. C. K. Hyder, Vice-Chairperson and Employers' member, Bangladesh, of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters, 79th Session, 1992, to wish him good health and a speedy recovery.

Considerations of the proposed Convention contained in Report IV (2B)

PREAMBLE

17. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to refer in the third preambular paragraph to the conclusion of the Tripartite Advisory Meeting on Environment and the World of Work presented to the ILO Governing Body at its 16-19 November 1992 Session was subamended by them not to refer to this meeting but instead to replace the word "comprehensive" in that paragraph by "global". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

18. The Government member of Korea withdrew an amendment to delete the fourth preambular paragraph.

19. An amendment by the Government member of Japan to replace the word "noting" by the word "recalling" in the fourth preambular paragraph was also withdrawn.

20. The preamble, as amended, was adopted.

PART I. DEFINITIONS AND SCOPE

Article 1[1]

21. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (a) to insert the words "or biological organism" after the word "mixture" for a wider coverage of the Convention as major accidents involving biological organisms might occur and for the reason that the issue was dealt with by the Occupational Safety and Health Convention (No. 155), 1981. The Employers' members considered that the inclusion of biological hazards was inappropriate as the proposed Convention was structured to deal with conventional hazards such as flammable, explosive or toxic materials. Considering the pathogenicity of micro-organisms, it was not possible to define "organisms" in the sense of "hazardous substances" evaluated by chemical, physical and toxicological properties. Several Government members opposed the amendment on the same grounds. The Government member of Hungary shared the concerns of the Workers' members, while agreeing with the view of the Employers' members, and proposed as an alternative the preparation by the Committee of a consensus statement inviting the International Labour Office to take appropriate steps to address the biological hazards with the ultimate purpose of formulating international standards on safety in biotechnology. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment on condition that a Working Party would elaborate a statement or a resolution on the subject of biotechnology and biological hazards, and a Working Party was subsequently established.

22. An amendment was proposed by the Employers' members to add, at the end of subparagraph (a), the words "which, under certain circumstances, is capable of giving rise to a major accident". They believed that hazards were inherent and there was a need to emphasize the link with major accidents in the proposed text. It was withdrawn in the face of opposition by the Workers' and Government members.

23. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which sought to add the words "or a major hazard activity" at the end of subparagraph (b) as they thought it would enhance clarity as the term "installation" referred to a fixed area. Following opposition by the Employers' and Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

24. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (c) to replace the word "term" by the word "terms" in the first line and the words "which exceed" by the word "exceeding" in the fourth line. The amendment also sought to delete the words "or categories of substances" and to introduce a text incorporating the concept of transport in the definition. In the ensuing discussion, the Employers' members opposed the addition of the word "transport" as it extended the scope of the provision and opposed the deletion of the reference to "categories of substances" since this diluted the definition. The Employers' view was further supported by several Government members. As a result, and given the outcome of the discussion on subparagraph (b), the Workers' members withdrew their amendment.

[1] The numbering of the Articles and Parts of the text as well as the titles of the Articles reproduces that of the proposed Convention in Report IV (2B). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Articles, parts of the text or the titles of the Articles in the proposed Convention reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

25. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "unexpected, sudden" in subparagraph (d) arguing that many major accidents were expected. The Employers' members and several Government members opposed the amendment as these terms were crucial to the definition of a "major accident". Subsequently, the Workers' members introduced a subamendment to replace in the Office text the word "unexpected" with the word "unplanned" and retain the word "sudden". The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed another subamendment to replace the word "unexpected" with the word "uncontrolled". Following an extensive discussion, it was decided to refer this amendment with its subamendments and another amendment to delete the word "sudden" submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia, to a Working Party. The Working Party, having considered the words "unexpected", "uncontrolled" and "unplanned" as unsatisfactory, proposed to replace the words "an unexpected," by the word "a" and to retain the word "sudden". This proposal was adopted by the Committee.

26. Another amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to delete the word "major" in the second line of subparagraph (d) on the grounds that it was an unnecessary qualifier and that the protection of workers against danger should be the primary objective. The Employers' members viewed that the word "major" was essential to the definition in that it provided some categorisation to report the type of accident, and the majority of the Government members agreed that the term was essential. After hearing the views of some Government members who considered that the definition could encompass emissions or fires leading to a serious danger, the amendment was withdrawn. In this context, the Government member of Spain noted that the term "major" in Spanish needs clarification.

27. The amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia and Sweden to insert the words "and risks" after the word "hazards" in the second line of subparagraph (e) for clarification and to bring the text in line with the intent of Article 9 (a) was adopted.

28. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "safety" in the last line of subparagraph (e) by the words "management of major accident hazards" in order to enhance the clarity of the definition. Faced with opposition by the Workers' members and the majority of the Government members who wanted to stress the concept of safety and who agreed that the proposed text of subparagraph (e) was satisfactory, the amendment was withdrawn.

29. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Angola to add a new subparagraph concerning a definition of the term "safety audit" was not seconded and was rejected.

30. There was a lengthy discussion on four identical amendments submitted by the Employers' members, the Government members of China and India and the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the European Communities (EC), to delete subparagraph (f) on the basis that the term "near miss" was difficult to define, did not cover day-to-day operations and was too complicated for the Employers' members to report on. The Workers' members strongly opposed this amendment because they maintained that the concept promoted the principle of the prevention of major accidents. Although several Government members recognised the need for further clarification of the definition of the term "near miss", they objected to its deletion in view of the importance of the concept and the usefulness of lessons learnt from it. While the representative of the Commission of the European Communities (CEC), speaking on behalf of the Government members of the member States of the EC, opposed the retention of the term "near miss", he supported the retention of the concept as conveyed in Article 13. At this juncture, the Chairman suggested an option of deferring the consideration of this amendment until Articles 9 and 13 had been discussed. After further discussion, as an agreement could not be reached, the amendment was put to vote and was rejected with 11,128 votes against, 9,368 votes in favour, and 304 abstentions. This vote retained the term "near miss" in the definitions.

31. Based on the outcome of the conclusion of the Working Party concerning the definition of the term "major accident" in subparagraph (d), an amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia to delete the word "sudden" from the first line in subparagraph (f) was withdrawn.

32. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to replace the word "event" by the words "minor accident" in the first line of subparagraph (f) for clarity of the definition. Faced with opposition by the Employers' and Workers' members, this amendment was also withdrawn.

33. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Hungary, Norway and the United States submitted an amendment to replace the text "effects of safety ... adverse effects" by the words "circumstances, could have escalated to a major accident" in subparagraph (f) for simplicity of the definition. The Employers' members did not believe that the amendment improved the proposed text. The Workers' members proposed referring the text to a Working Party, which was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that this proposal anticipated the discussion on Articles 9 and 13. The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the member States of the EC, introduced a subamendment to the amendment to replace the word "circumstances" by the words "effects, actions or systems". Following further discussion, the Committee adopted the amendment as subamended while agreeing to a further subamendment to delete the term "unplanned" in the first line of subparagraph (f) for consistency with the conclusion of the Working Party concerning the drafting of subparagraph (d) as approved by the Committee. Part 2 of the original amendment to delete the article "the" preceding the word "mitigating" in the second line, was referred to the Committee Drafting Committee. Based on the outcome of the discussion of this amendment, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to insert in subparagraph (f) the word "emergency" before the word "safety" in the second line and also before the word "procedures" in the third line, the words "or the environment," in the fourth line, and to delete the words "or the environment" in the fourth line.

34. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the EC submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph under Article 1 to read: "This Convention is concerned with the prevention of major accidents involving hazardous substances and the limitation of their consequences" in order to define the scope of the Convention. This amendment was opposed by the Workers' members who believed that the amendment defined an objective and not a scope. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to add at the end of the amendment the phrase "at fixed major hazard installations". In the ensuing discussion, the Government member of the United States proposed to defer the discussion of the amendment and its subamendment in conjunction with Article 2. This proposal was accepted by the Committee.

35. Article 1, as amended, was adopted.

36. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete paragraph 1 of Article 2 since the objective of the Convention was the prevention of major accidents and that any exclusion would result in the risk of danger to workers, the public and the environment, especially in developing countries which did not have regulations to guard against such danger. The Convention would complement existing regulations in industrially developed countries and would neither compete with nor aim to replace those regulations. ILO Conventions were the only international instruments with focus on workers' issues, given their tripartite structure. The Workers' members further submitted a subamendment to their original amendment which sought to discuss each of the three subparagraphs of Article 2 (1) separately. The Employers' members and several Government members opposed the subamendment. A lengthy discussion ensued in which the Workers' members further elaborated on the reasons for their subamendment. However, the Employers' members and several Government members maintained their opposition. The Workers' members withdrew the subamendment and the Committee proceeded with the debate on the amendment. The Employers' members argued for the exclusion of the installations listed under paragraph 1, stating that the provision strengthened the Convention. They noted that nuclear installations had their own strict control measures whilst the facilities handling non-radioactive substances at these installations remained within the scope of the Convention. They expressed their concern for safety and health in transport but maintained that while transport was covered by various existing regulations, their primary objection was that its coverage by the Convention required the addition of a significant number of technical provisions that were outside the scope of the discussions the Committee had during the development of this Convention. Several Government members such as those of Nigeria and the United States cited that military installations were exempted from the scope of their national legislation. The Government member of Algeria spoke in support of the Workers' amendment and noted that Paragraph 2 of this Article provided the flexibility for exclusions. After further debate and put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 186,147 votes against, 136,826 votes in favour, and no abstentions.

37. The Government members of Australia and Sweden submitted an amendment to replace paragraph 1 of Article 2 by the text "The Convention applies to all fixed major hazard installations". In introducing the amendment, the Government member of Australia argued that there should be no provisions for automatic exclusion of installations from the scope of the Convention, and that exclusions should be decided on a case-by-case basis. Deep concern was expressed at the growing risks and the increasing number of serious accidents related to the use of hazardous substances and chemical products which resulted in the death of several thousands of persons, both inside and outside the installations. He emphasized the need to enhance the consultative mechanism between employers' and workers' organizations concerning integrated and comprehensive policies for hazard prevention in connection with the use of dangerous processes as well as the production, transport, storage, handling and disposal of hazardous substances. He considered that the present UN treaties were liability treaties and not safety and health treaties. The Workers' members supported the amendment based on the arguments forwarded during the discussion of their previous amendment on the subject of exclusion. The Employers' members, however, reiterated their opposition to the amendment which they viewed would weaken the Convention. Following a discussion in which the Government members expressed varying views, the amendment was voted and rejected by 181,374 votes against, 138,417 votes in favour, and 3,182 abstentions.

38. The Government member of Korea submitted an amendment to delete subparagraph (c), arguing that transport possessed the potential of major industrial accidents. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the basis of arguments forwarded by them during the previous discussion of the amendments which sought to either delete or replace Paragraph 1 of the Article. They also reiterated the view that the inclusion of transport within the scope of the Convention required technical details which were neither contained in the Convention nor in the ILO Code of Practice. The Workers' spokesperson supported the amendment by referring to the statement made by the representative of the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF). She recalled that the representative had underlined that the proposed ILO Convention would complement existing standards on transport whilst stating that there only existed two universal standards on the subject, namely the International Maritime Dangerous Goods Code and the International Convention on Civil Aviation. There were no other international instruments with respect to all other transport except in Europe. Even the international codes that existed were not harmonized. More importantly, the existing international Conventions covered international transport and not internal transport. Some Government members supported the amendment by sharing the arguments of the Workers' members, while several others were against it and took the same view as that expressed by the Employers' members. The amendment was voted and rejected by 182,965 votes against, 136,826 votes in favour and 1,591 abstentions.

39. Two identical amendments to delete the words "other than pipeline" from subparagraph (c) were submitted by the Employers' members and the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the EC. In introducing their amendment, the Employers' members stated that although pipelines could be recognized as being fixed they were a mode of transport and, as such, pipelines should not be included in the scope of the Convention. Because of the transboundary nature of pipelines, there were difficulties in defining threshold quantities and in the preparation of safety reports. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the EC, reiterated that pipelines required different safety considerations, and argued that emergency plans might have to involve several countries and that threshold quantities were difficult to fix. The inclusion of pipelines in the proposed Convention would therefore create difficulties in the eventual ratification. The Workers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that threshold quantities could be determined based on the volume of and the flow of chemicals in the pipeline and that pipelines were already included in the ILO Code of Practice. Several Government members supported the inclusion of pipelines as they presented a great potential for major accidents. The amendment was voted and rejected with 181,374 votes against, 141,599 votes in favour and 1,591 abstentions.

40. An amendment to add a new subparagraph to exclude "Extraction and other mining operations" was submitted and subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom to read "The extraction of oil and gas off-shore". Despite the potential of major accidents associated with particularly hazardous off-shore operations, their exemption was considered necessary as this Convention did not provide for proper control regime in this sector. It was further pointed out that excluding the extraction of oil and gas off-shore from this Convention would enable the ILO to develop more comprehensive instruments in the future. The Employers' members were reluctant to support the amendment because it introduced a new topic which had not been discussed during the development of the Convention. In the face of the reluctance of the Employers' and Workers' members to support the amendment, it was withdrawn.

41. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Japan to delete the words "and other interested parties who may be affected," in paragraph 2. The reason given was that although major accidents could affect the public and the environment, that did not necessarily mean all parties should be consulted, especially when the issues were technical in nature. The retention of the phrase left the definition open as to who was to be consulted. While the Workers' members supported the amendment for the reasons indicated, the Employers' members and the majority of the Government members held opposite views by stressing the need for extending the consultation process to include other interested parties who might be affected, to help the ratification process. As a result the Workers' members withdrew their support to the amendment which was subsequently withdrawn.

42. Another amendment was also submitted by the Government member of Japan to replace the words "for which equivalent protection is provided" in paragraph 2 by the text ", when the competent authority is satisfied that the overall protection afforded to them in pursuance of national law and practice is not inferior to that which would result from the full application of the provisions of the Convention." The purpose of the amendment was to highlight the provision of equivalent protection as the paragraph dealt with the exclusions from the scope of the Convention. Furthermore, final decisions for such exclusions should be made by the competent authority in the light of national laws and established practices, a provision which was already in the Chemicals Convention (No. 170) adopted in 1990. This amendment was similarly supported by the Workers' members but opposed by the Employers' and several Government members. Subsequently, the Workers' members withdrew their support and the amendment was also withdrawn noting the general understanding that the idea was covered by the original text.

43. The amendment which was previously submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the EC, to add a new paragraph under Article 1 to read "This Convention is concerned with the prevention of major accidents involving hazardous substances and the limitation of their consequences" was tabled for discussion in view of its relevance to Article 2. The amendment was intended to provide a general coverage of the scope. It was subamended by the Employers' members to add after the word "substances" the words "at fixed major hazard installations.". The Government members submitting the amendment noted that the term "fixed" was confusing because it was not clear whether it referred to the physical parameter of the installation or to the concept of mobility; and further amended the subamendment to delete the word "fixed". The text was further amended by the Workers' members who introduced the words "applies to major hazard installations and" after the words "The Convention" for clarity and delete similar wording proposed by Employers' members to be inserted after the word "substances". In the ensuing discussion, there was a general consensus concerning the amendment as subamended three times and the finalization of the text was left to the Committee Drafting Committee provided that the new paragraph ranged first in the order of paragraphs in Article 2.

44. The Government members of Canada, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read: "The Convention applies to all fixed major hazard installations." and withdrew it in favour of the amendment submitted by the EC members as subamended. The amendment submitted by the Government member of China to add a new paragraph to read: "This Convention applies to all sites in which a major hazard installation exists." In the light of the outcome of the discussion of the previous amendment to introduce a new paragraph, the Government member of China also withdrew his amendment.

45. Article 2, as amended, was adopted.

46. In response to a query by the Government member of Switzerland concerning the definition of the word "consultation", the representative of the Secretary-General stated that the term referred to a process whereby governments tried in good faith to take into account the views of the parties consulted, such as representative organisations of Employers and Workers, in making their decisions. The government remained in principle responsible to take the final decision. The term "after consulting" referred to the case where a final decision by the Government would be taken after consultations had taken place. The term "in consultation with", more frequent in recent instruments, placed emphasis on the continuing character of the obligation to consult. Guidance as to the principles of such a process was provided in the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention (No. 144), adopted in 1976.

Article 3

47. Since no amendments were proposed, Article 3 was adopted without change.

48. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, member States of the EC, withdrew an amendment to change the title of Part I of the Convention to "Scope and definition" in favour of a similar one proposed by the Government member of China, as well as a proposal to rearrange the order of Articles 1, 2 and 3 to 2, 3 and 1. The amendment was adopted.

PART II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

49. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words ", the public and the environment" after the word "workers" in the fifth line in paragraph 1. The purpose of the reformulation of the text in this amendment was to ensure that "other interested parties" were not mandated to consult on issues concerning the protection of the workers. The amendment was believed to improve the congruency of the text. Related to this amendment, the Workers' members also submitted another one to delete the words "taking account of their effects on the public and the environment" from the fifth and the sixth lines in paragraph 1. The two amendments were opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that the Convention was concerned mainly with the prevention of major accidents and their effects on the workers. While some Government members opposed the two amendments, several others expressed their support. Put to vote, the two amendments were adopted by 12,733 votes in favour, 10,829 votes against, with 952 abstentions.

50. An amendment to delete the words ", where practicable," from paragraph 2 was submitted by the Workers' members who argued that the phrase introduced an unnecessary qualifier as the words "best available safety technologies" already provided the intent. Retention of the text would weaken the emphasis on the need to make use of the best available safety technologies. The Employers' members opposed the deletion of the words "where practicable" because it was not always possible to identify or implement best available technology, especially in developing countries, and where existing technologies provided an acceptable level of protection. The Employers' members also observed that it was not practicable to achieve the highest safety standards within a short period. The Government members of the member States of the EC also stated that the provision was only about promoting the use of the best available technologies. Other Government members also opposed the amendment, which was subsequently withdrawn.

51. Article 4, as amended, was adopted.

52. The Government members of Australia, Canada and the United States introduced an amendment to replace the words ", draw up" by the words "and other interested parties who may be affected, establish" arguing that this would improve the text and enhance its harmonization with that in other Articles. This amendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Workers' members and was adopted. A similar amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia to insert the words "and other interested parties who may be affected", after the word "workers" and to delete the word "and" after the word "employer" in the third line was withdrawn. Another amendment submitted by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia to replace the word "a" after the words "draw up" by the words "an effective" was also withdrawn.

53. The Government member of Switzerland submitted an amendment to replace the word "regularly" by the word "periodically" to enable the competent authority to plan periodic reviews only when the need arose, thus offering greater flexibility to the instrument. This amendment was opposed by the Workers' members who emphasized that the term "regular" referred to a reasonable duration between updates and reviews of systems and that such action was necessary for the safety of the workers. The Employers' members preferred the original text and the amendment was withdrawn.

54. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

Article 6

55. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Hungary to delete the words "to a competitor". The Workers' members were against the amendment as it widened the possibility of protecting confidential information. The Employers' members and several Government members supported the proposal. Subsequently, the Workers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendment was adopted.

56. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

PART III. RESPONSIBILITIES OF EMPLOYERS

IDENTIFICATION

Article 7

57. Since no amendments were proposed, Article 7 was adopted without change.

NOTIFICATION

Article 8

58. The Government members of Australia, Canada, and the United States submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read: "Employers shall also notify the competent authority before any permanent closure of a major hazard installation.", so as to enable the competent authority to take any necessary action. The Employers' members opposed the amendment arguing that such notification was unnecessary because of the burden it placed on the employer at a time when the safety report contained all the necessary information. The Workers' members supported the amendment as they considered it was essential to alert the competent authorities to enable them to monitor the closure to ensure a safe decomissioning of the installation. Their view was also shared by several Government members. The Government members of the member States of the EC stated that the issue relating to the closure of installations would be better dealt with by their amendment proposed to Article 12 on the safety report. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to replace the word "before" by the words "on the occasion of". This was opposed by the Workers' members and several Government members and the Employers' members withdrew their subamendment. The amendment was carried and its sequence in the Article was left to the Committee Drafting Committee to determine.

59. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

New Article

60. As the amendment submitted by the Government member of Angola to introduce a new Article after Article 8 was not seconded, it was not discussed.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE LEVEL OF THE INSTALLATION

61. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to add the following text at the end of subparagraph (a): "or, in the case of member States where employers are obliged to observe comprehensive safety standards which are provided by the competent authority and are satisfactory for the prevention of major accidents, the assessment which has been conducted for the purpose of observing such safety standards". This amendment sought to allow for an alternative approach to set up detailed and comprehensive national safety standards which covered technical requirements such as specification of materials to be used, voluntary inspection of plants, specification of safety equipment, education and training and staffing by qualified personnel. By complying with such rigorous technical standards, employers could achieve the highest level of safety. Therefore, such a system as that in Japan and some other countries, should also be considered to offer an equivalent safety system as that in the Convention. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment as it provided flexibility to allow for different systems. The Employers' members agreed with the proposal but did not support the amendment as they considered that the Convention did allow for systems that provided equivalent protection, and they abstained. The Workers' members were reluctant in supporting the amendment because its intention was not clear as an option for an equivalent system to that in the original text and they abstained. Subsequently, the Committee having no quorum, the amendment was not carried.

62. An amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to insert the words "fail-safe systems," after the word "design," in subparagraph (b) in order to expand the provision to include reference to such safety systems. In support of the proposal, the Employers' members suggested to expand the coverage to include more than just the reference to fail-safe systems through a subamendment which sought to replace the words "fail-safe systems" by the words "safety systems". Such systems would be introduced based on the results of risk assessment and hazard and operability studies. Whilst the Government members of the member States of the EC supported the subamendment, other Government members opposed it. The Workers' members supported the subamendment, and it was adopted.

63. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "choice of" from subparagraph (b) on the grounds that they were superfluous. This amendment was opposed by the Workers' members who emphasized the need to justify the use of a chemical taking the principle of substitution into consideration. Whilst the Government member of Austria appreciated the concern of the Workers' members, he pointed out that the chemicals had already been chosen by the technology and that it was sufficient to indicate them and proposed a subamendment to replace the words "choice of chemicals" by "an indication of chemicals used". The Government member of Hungary pointed out that the subparagraph addressed technical measures and that the choice of the chemicals, rather than the chemicals themselves, was the appropriate term to use, and opposed both the amendment and its subamendment. Following the support of this view by several Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

64. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "levels, hours of work" in subparagraph (c) by the word "arrangements" as they felt the Office text went into detail concerning the number of staff, qualifications and time-frames. The purpose of the amendment was to broaden and strengthen the Convention. The Workers' members opposed the amendment because they believed that staffing levels and the hours of work were closely related to safety. Their views were shared by several Government members and the amendment was withdrawn.

65. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to delete the words "on the site" from subparagraph (c) without discussion.

66. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to delete the word "the" in the second line of subparagraph (d) (i) arguing that the word changed the meaning of the text. Following a brief discussion, the matter was referred to the Committee Drafting Committee.

67. Another amendment to add a new clause between clauses (ii) and (iii) in subparagraph (d) to read "appropriate emergency medical plans and procedures to address the health consequences of a major accident;" was submitted by the Workers' members. The reason was to ensure that the provision of medical emergency plans in the case of a major accident was included in the text. This amendment was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that it was unnecessary since the provision was already covered in Article 9 and that an effective emergency plan would necessarily include medical emergency planning. Following opposition by several Government members who shared the Employers' members' view, the Workers' members subamended their amendment by adding the words "on-site" after the word "appropriate". This was further subamended by the Government member of Cyprus who proposed to delete the words "to address the health consequences of a major accident" from the text of the amendment. In an attempt to accommodate the concerns of the Workers' members, the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment which sought to add the words ", including the health consequences of major accidents" after the word "plans" in subparagraph (d) (i). After a lengthy debate, the proposals were referred to a Working Party and the finalized text read as follows: "the preparation of effective site emergency plans and procedures, including emergency medical procedures, to be applied in case of major accidents or threat thereof, with periodic testing and evaluation of their effectiveness and revision as necessary;".

68. An amendment was submitted by the Government members of Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Slovakia, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States to add the following new subparagraph: "The recording of the lessons previously discussed with workers and their representatives, which have been drawn from near misses". In introducing this amendment, the Government member of Switzerland explained that the term "near miss" brought in a new concept that needed to be directed towards prevention. The amendment was subamended by the Workers' members by replacing its text with the words "improvement, including measures for gathering information and analyzing accidents and near misses. The lessons so learnt shall be discussed with the workers and their representatives and shall be recorded in accordance with national law and practice." Following wide support by the Employers' members and several Government members, the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

69. On the basis of the result of the discussion on the previous amendment the Employers' members withdrew, without discussion, an amendment they had submitted to introduce similar wording.

70. Article 9, as amended, was adopted.

SAFETY REPORT

Article 10

71. Since no amendments were proposed, Article 10 was adopted without change.

Article 11

72. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to replace the word "report" by the word "reports" and the words "Article 10" by the words "Articles 10 and 12". The Employers' and Workers' members supported the amendment and it was adopted.

73. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia submitted an amendment to add at the end of Article 11 the words ", within such a period as prescribed by national laws or regulations" in order to define the time-frame needed for the submission of the safety report to the competent authority. Faced with opposition by the Employers' and Workers' members, the amendment was withdrawn.

74. Article 11, as amended, was adopted.

Article 12

75. The Government members of the member States of the EC withdrew an amendment which sought to add a new subparagraph concerning the review, update and amendment of the safety report on the occasion of the permanent closure of a major hazard installation as a similar provision was introduced in Article 8.

76. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph as number (2) to read "Employers shall comply with all recommendations concerning improvement or suspension of operations as prescribed by the competent authority". The Employers believed that despite the importance of the issue, they could not support the amendment as the word "recommendation" was imprecise and could include an opinion. The majority of the Government members also opposed the amendment and it was withdrawn.

77. Article 12 was adopted without change.

ACCIDENT REPORTING

Article 13

78. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia withdrew an amendment to replace the words "as soon as" by the words "within such period as prescribed by national laws or regulations when" based on the outcome of a previous discussion on a similar amendment.

79. Three identical amendments were submitted by the Government members of Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Slovakia, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States; the Government member of China and the Employers' members to delete the text "and make available ... from near misses" from the Article. As the provision in the text proposed for deletion was already inserted in Article 9, the amendments were adopted.

80. Following the adoption of the previous three amendments, the amendment submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC was not discussed.

81. Article 13, as amended, was adopted.

Article 14

82. The Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia withdrew, without discussion, their amendment which sought to delete the words "within a fixed time-frame" and to insert the words "within a fixed time-frame as prescribed by national laws or regulations" after the word "accident" in paragraph 1, based on the outcome of previous discussions on the issue.

83. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the word "detailed" in paragraph 1 as unnecessary. The amendment was opposed by the Workers' members and several Government members and was subsequently withdrawn.

84. There was a lengthy discussion on an amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace the words "and describing" in paragraph 1 by the words ", its impact on human health, property and the environment, and actions detailing". The Workers' members maintained that as many details as possible were required to enable the competent authority to assess the impact of accidents. The Employers' members opposed the amendment by explaining that the consideration of the impact on human health, property and the environment went beyond the scope of an accident report. The Government members of the member States of the EC and several other Government members shared the Employers' members' concern and for similar reasons. At this stage, the Government member of Sweden submitted a subamendment to replace the words ", its impact... the environment" in the text of the amendment by the words "its immediate consequences, and". This subamendment was supported by the Workers' members but was opposed by the Employers' members and several others. Another subamendment was submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom to replace the Workers' members' amendment by retaining the words "and describing" and inserting the words "its immediate consequences, and" after those two words. This received the support of the Workers' members, but was opposed by the Employers' members who introduced a further subamendment to the subamendment to insert the word "on-site" after the word "immediate". Following a discussion, the amendment, as subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom and the Employers' members, was adopted.

85. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "detailing" by the word "describing" in paragraph 2 that sought to improve the clarity. The Workers' members opposed the amendment arguing that the word "describing" was not comprehensive enough. The amendment was withdrawn.

86. An amendment by the Workers' members to replace the word "steps" by the word "actions" in paragraph 2 was adopted.

87. Article 14, as amended, was adopted.

New Article

88. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to introduce a new article under Part III of the Convention to read: "Employers shall have the ultimate responsibility for the prevention of major accidents. In the case of a major accident, the employer shall ensure prompt reparation for all those affected." They based their argument on past major accidents which left families of victims with no financial support and which resulted in damage to property and the environment. The proposal was in line with the "polluter pays" principle but was not intended to change the legal structure. The Government member of the Russian Federation agreed to the principle of liability being discussed but questioned its position in the Convention. While agreeing that they were responsible for preventing major accidents, the Employers' members opposed the amendment because in their view it addressed reparations which were legal issues that went beyond the scope of the Convention. Their view was also shared by the Government members of Algeria, Australia, Austria, Botswana, Hungary, Japan, Lesotho, Malawi, Nigeria, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zimbabwe. The Government members of the members States of the EC expressed their appreciation of the Workers' members' concerns but maintained that since the issue was not brought up during the first-year discussion at the 79th Session, the Committee did not have the basis to discuss the amendment and suggested deferring its discussion to the Recommendation. This idea was suppported by the Government members of Ghana, Indonesia and the United Kingdom. At this stage, the Workers' members requested the setting-up of a working party to finalize a text which incorporated their views for inclusion in the Recommendation. The proposal for a working party was opposed by the Government members of Austria and the United Kingdom and by the Employers' members. This was followed by a subamendment by the Workers' members to replace their amendment by "Recognising that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, member States should ensure that systems are in place to compensate workers and the public as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the environment". As the Employers' members considered that the subamendment continued to include compensation, they maintained their opposition to including a provision which was outside the scope of the Convention. Given ample time for discussion, such a provision might be more suited for consideration in a Recommendation. This view was supported by several Government members such as Australia, Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. Following a general consensus of the Committee to shift the discussion of the subamendment from the Convention to the Recommendation, the Workers' members withdrew both the amendment and subamendment proposed for the Convention on the understanding that the matter would be further considered within the framework of the Recommendation.

PART IV. RESPONSIBILITIES OF COMPETENT AUTHORITIES

OFF-SITE EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Article 15

Since no amendments were proposed, Article 15 was adopted without change.

Article 16

90. The Government member of Korea submitted an amendment to add at the end of subparagraph (b) the words "with information on safety measures and the correct behaviour to adopt;" for the purpose of ensuring that the necessary information was transmitted by the competent authority. The Workers' members opposed the amendment as they believed its intent was already reflected in subparagraph (a). Their view was shared by the Government members of the member States of the EC and by other Government members such as those of Algeria and the United Kingdom. The Employers' members supported the amendment but following the wider interpretation given by the Committee, they withdrew their support, and the amendment was withdrawn.

91. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to replace subparagraph (c) by the text "where a major accident could have transboundary effects, the information required in (a) and (b) is provided to the States concerned, to assist in cooperation and coordination arrangements." The amendment was aimed at placing the competence to cooperate and coordinate with the member States as the competent authorities did not have the authority to do so. Both the Employers' and the Workers' members supported the amendment, and it was adopted. As such, an amendment by the Workers' members to delete the words ", as appropriate," in the proposed Office text was not discussed.

92. Article 16, as amended, was adopted.

SITING OF MAJOR HAZARD INSTALLATIONS

Article 17

93. An amendment to replace the word "reflect" by the words "be based on" proposed by the Government member of Cyprus was not seconded and was rejected.

94. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read: "The siting policy shall be periodically updated taking account of: (i) the risks arising from the installation; (ii) the need for appropriate separation, on a long-term basis, of hazardous installations, residential areas, public facilities and natural areas of particular interest, susceptibility or vulnerability; (iii) appropriate measures for existing installations." This amendment was intended to widen the scope of siting policies to include the three areas mentioned. Several Government members such as those of Algeria, Austria, India, Japan and the Government members of the member States of the EC as well as the Employers' members opposed the amendment as it was considered too detailed and would create difficulties in implementation. Subsequently the Workers' members submitted a subamendment to replace the words "taking account of ... existing installations" by the words "as may be required". As it was believed that the provision was already included in Article 4, several Government members and the Employers' members opposed the subamendment. The Workers' members withdrew their proposals on the understanding that the notion of updating the siting policy was already included in Article 4.

95. Article 17 was adopted without change.

INSPECTION

Article 18

96. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "or" by the word "and" in the third line in accordance with the conclusion of the Committee, at the 79th Session, 1992. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that this change ensured that the competent authority had the skills in all the areas of inspection, investigation, assessment and advice. The Employers' members supported it and the amendment was adopted.

97. The Government members of Brazil and Venezuela submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read: "The representatives of the Employers and the representatives of the Workers, as well as the members of the Safety and Health Committee, shall have the opportunity to accompany inspectors supervising the application of the measures prescribed in pursuance of this Convention." The reason for this amendment was to establish and strengthen tripartite cooperation. The Employers' members opposed the amendment because it was detailed and introduced a new category, namely the safety and health committee members, which was not discussed before. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment which sought to delete the word "the" preceding the word "representatives", and the words ", as well . . . Health Committee," and to replace the word "opportunity" by the word "right". This in their view ensured that the number of persons accompanying an inspector was reasonable. In a further subamendment, the Government member of Brazil proposed to add the phrase: "The competent authority shall adopt provisions by which" at the beginning of the paragraph as a clear indication to the title of Part IV. The Government members of the member States of the EC proposed another subamendment to amend the Workers' members amendment to retain the word "opportunity" in favour of the word "right" and add at the end of the text the phrase "unless this would be prejudicial to the pursuance of their duties". Neither of these subamendments was supported by the Workers' members and some Government members. At this stage, the Representative of the Secretary-General recalled the text of a relevant provision from the Convention concerning the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration), (No. 148), 1977, particularly that of Article 5.4 which read: "Representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers of the undertaking shall have the opportunity to accompany inspectors supervising the application of the measures prescribed in pursuance of this Convention, unless the inspectors consider, in the light of the general instructions of the competent authority, that this may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties." Based on this explanation, the Committee agreed to adopt the text of Article 5.4 of Convention No. 148 but to replace the word "undertaking" by the words "major hazard installation", and the new paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

98. Article 18, as amended, was adopted.

New Article

99. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to introduce a new Article after Article 18 to read: "The competent authority shall have the right to suspend any operation which poses a serious danger to workers, the public or the environment." so as to highlight the responsibility of the competent authority. This amendment was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that it pronounced a stated right which could be misread outside the context of regulations. Whilst the amendment was supported by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Nigeria, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia it was opposed by others including the Government members of Japan, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. This was followed by a subamendment submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom to replace the words "a serious danger... the environment" by the words "an imminent risk of a major accident." The Government member of Switzerland submitted a further subamendment to add at the end of the amendment as subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom the words "if it is not possible to eliminate the risk by technical or organizational means." In response to this subamendment, the Employers' members stated that in the presence of the word "imminent", it was superfluous to talk about elimination, and voiced their support to the text as subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom provided it ended with the words "in accordance with national law and practice". Support to the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom was voiced also by the Workers' members and the Government members of France, India and the United States. A subamendment by the Government member of Japan to replace the word "imminent" by the word "impending" and to delete the words "the public or the environment" from the original text was not supported. Finally, there was agreement to accept the subamendment by the Government member of the United Kingdom, by substituting the word "risk" by the word "threat" and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted. It read: "The competent authority shall have the right to suspend any operation which poses an imminent threat of a major accident".

100. The new Article, as amended, was adopted.

PART V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Article 19

101. An amendment was submitted by the Government members of the member States of the EC to add the words ", and incidents which have arisen" at the end of subparagraph (a) in order to broaden its coverage. The Workers' members supported the notion but proposed a subamendment to replace the word "incidents" by the words "near misses" so as to avoid the use of a term which had not been defined. The Government member of the United Kingdom observed that the change introduced went further than the original intent and was not appropriate. The Employers' members supported the original amendment, and so did the Government member of Zimbabwe who opposed its subamendment on the grounds that the term "near miss" was a subset of the word "incident". The Government member of Malawi proposed another subamendment to delete the word "incident". Following a discussion, the original amendment was withdrawn.

102. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia and the United States to delete subparagraph (d) was withdrawn without discussion.

103. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace the words "jobs, and without being placed at any disadvantage" by the word "job"; insert the words "to believe" after the word "justification"; and to delete the words "to believe" in the third line of subparagraph (d). This amendment together with another amendment which sought to add a new subparagraph to read "not be placed at any disadvantage because of the actions referred to in (d) above", intended to reformulate the subparagraph to read as agreed upon by the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters at the 79th Session, 1992. The Employers' members agreed to replacing the word "jobs" by the word "job" and inserting the words "to believe" after the word "justification" but opposed the deletion of the words "and without being placed at any disadvantage" and preferred the Office text which consisted of fewer subparagraphs. The Government member of the United Kingdom did not see the need to split the subparagraph and proposed to subamend the first part of the amendment by deleting the words ", and without being placed at any disadvantage", limiting the modification to only replacing the word "jobs" by the word "job". The Workers' members opposed the subamendment in that they preferred a direct linkage between the word "disadvantage" and the words "corrective action". The Employers' members believed the expression "without being placed at any disadvantage" related to the action as qualified by "based on their training and experience" and "their belief that there is an imminent danger." The Workers' members did not support this view as they considered it was an inappropriate interpretation. Several Government members and the Employers' members supported the subamendment, which was eventually accepted by the Workers' members on the understanding that the expression "disadvantage" was related to the word "action". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

104. An amendment submitted by the Government member of India to delete the words "and if necessary interrupt the activity" was withdrawn in the face of opposition by the Employers' members and the Workers' members.

105. The Government members of the member States of the EC submitted an amendment to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "be informed about any recommendation made by the competent authority;" on the basis of the usefulness of such information to the workers. The Workers' members supported the amendment on the understanding that the "recommendations" referred to decisions, orders and instructions. The Employers' members too supported the amendment, which was adopted. The actual text to be used for the new subparagraph was left to the Committee Drafting Committee.

106. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "have the right to speak with and accompany the competent authority in any inspection or investigation of an installation covered by the scope of this Convention". This amendment was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that its intent was covered by Article 18. Followed by opposition from the Government members of the member States of the EC and the Government members of Australia, Austria and the United States, the amendment was withdrawn.

107. The Workers' members further submitted an amendment to introduce a new subparagraph to read: "have the right to notify the competent authority in the case of a potential hazard", explaining that the amendment involved a new concept covering the rights of workers. This was opposed by the Employers' members on the grounds that the text was merely encouraging workers to contact the competent authority at a time when they should be notifying their supervisor of a potential hazard. Accordingly, the Employers' members proposed a subamendment to replace the words "in the case of a potential hazard" by the words "where they have reasonable justification to believe, based on their training and experience, that there is an imminent danger of a major accident, and notify their supervisor before or as soon as possible after taking such action". The Workers' members opposed this amendment as the provision belonged to Article 20 on the duties of workers. It was also opposed by the Government member of the United States on the grounds that the text appeared in subparagraph (d), and by the Government members of the member States of the EC and by Sweden for the same reason. Following an extensive debate, the Employers' members proposed another subamendment to insert the words "without neglecting to notify the employer at the same time" after the word "hazard". The new proposal was still unacceptable to the Workers' members who maintained that they did not oppose the notion but they wanted to ensure that the workers had the right to refer to the competent authority in situations where the employer failed to respond. A similar opposition was reiterated by the Government members of Brazil and Austria who believed that the provision was covered by subparagraph (d). At this stage the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a further subamendment to replace the original amendment by the text "discuss with the employer any potential hazard capable of generating a major accident and have the right to notify the competent authority of those hazards." As an acceptable alternative, and with the agreement to insert the words "they consider" before the word "capable", in the latter subamendment, the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

108. On the basis of the previous amendments, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to add a new subparagraph to read "not be placed at any disadvantage because of the actions referred to in (d) above".

109. Article 19, as amended, was adopted.

Article 20

110. The Government members of the member States of the EC withdrew an amendment to add a new subparagraph to read "inform the employer of any malfunctioning or defects which they detect at their workplace and which they believe may contribute directly or indirectly to a major accident" based on the result of a lengthy discussion that led to the adoption of a previous amendment to Article 19 which contained a similar provision.

111. For similar reasons as stated above, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to add a new subparagraph to read "be required to report forthwith to the works management any situation which they believe could present a deviation from normal operating conditions, in particular a situation which could develop into a major accident."

112. Subsequent to their withdrawal of a previous amendment to delete subparagraph (d) in Article 19, the Government members of Australia and the United States withdrew an amendment to add a new subparagraph to read "within the scope of their jobs, and without being placed at any disadvantage, take corrective action and if necessary interrupt the activity where they have reasonable justification, based on their training and experience, to believe that there is an imminent danger of a major accident, and notify their supervisor or raise the alarm, as appropriate, before or as soon as possible after taking such action".

113. Article 20 was adopted without change.

PART VI. RESPONSIBILITY OF EXPORTING STATES

Article 21

114. The Government members of Austria and of Japan and the United States submitted two identical amendments to delete Article 21. In introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States stressed that in its present form, the proposed text of the Article was an obstacle to ratification of the Convention by member States. The provisions required rigorous monitoring of business communications between countries. He further emphasized that reputable business enterprises would abide by the law, and that the implementation of this Article would be unwieldly. His position was affirmed by the Government member of Austria for similar reasons. The Government member of Japan also supported the amendments on the grounds that first, the prohibition of the export of hazardous substances was covered by the Chemicals Convention (No. 170), 1990 and that secondly, the definitions of hazardous processes and hazardous technologies were not clear. Whilst the above view was supported by some Government members such as those of the Czech Republic, Germany, the Netherlands, Slovak Republic and the United Kingdom, it was opposed by others such as the Government members of Indonesia, Korea and Lebanon as well as the Workers' members. Supporting the notion but opposed to the proposed text were the Government members of Canada, India and Swaziland who were joined by the Employers' members. At this stage the Government members of the United States and Japan withdrew their amendment while the Government member of Austria maintained his position and his amendment was rejected by the Committee.

115. The Government members of the member States of the EC introduced an amendment to replace, in the first line, the words "an exporting" by the word "a", the words ", all or some uses" by the words "the use"; and in the second line to replace the word "are" by the word "is" and the words "for reasons of safety" by the words "or a potential source of major accident,"; and in the third and fourth lines to replace the words "by the exporting member State to any importing country," by the words "to the International Labour Office which will make the information available to any other State". The aim of the amendment was to achieve the dissemination of information on prohibited hazardous substances, processes and technologies in an effective way. The Workers' members opposed the amendment as the responsibility of disseminating the information was placed on the ILO whose commitment to an obligation such as this one had to be ascertained. While some Government members preferred the Office text to the amendment, the Government member of Sweden believed that the amendment was an improvement over the Office text but needed to be narrowed down in scope. The Government member of the United Kingdom believed that it was possible to relieve the ILO from the burden of the responsibility of collecting and disseminating the information and at the same time request member States to make the information on prohibited substances, processes and technology, available. In this regard the Representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that as far as the ILO's involvement was concerned, two things should be considered. These were the technical capability of the Office to handle the task and the resulting financial implications, citing that the ILO responded in the past to specific requests which required the establishment of workable mechanisms. In the light of the discussion, the Government member of France submitted a subamendment which read: "when in a member State, the use of hazardous substances, technologies or processes is prohibited as a potential source of a major accident, this fact and the reasons for it should be made available to any importing country". This was further subamended by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Nigeria, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia to add the words "by the exporting member State" after the word "available". It was understood that with this subamendment the importing countries would request the desired information when they determined such a need. It would then be made available to them by the exporting country. With the support by the Employers' and Workers' members, the amendment, as subamended by the Government members of Botswana, France, Lesotho, Malawi, Nigeria, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia was adopted.

116. The Government member of Austria reiterated his opposition to any text which placed an obligation on the member States and insisted on submitting a new subamendment which he withdrew faced with opposition by the majority of the Committee members.

117. An amendment by the Government members of Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Nigeria, Swaziland, Tanzania and Zambia to insert the word "fully" after the word "shall" in the third line was withdrawn based on the outcome of the discussion of the previous amendment. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Korea to add the words "and health," after the word "safety" in the second line; and that submitted by the Government members of Canada and the Slovak Republic to replace the Article by a new text were not discussed for a similar reason.

118. The two amendments submitted by the Government member of India to add "along with the name of the importer, the quantity being imported and the entry port" at the end of the Article, and a new paragraph to read "Each member State should formulate and implement a non-discriminatory policy on safety for both imported and exported hazardous substances." were not seconded, and were not discussed.

119. Article 21, as amended, was adopted.

120. The proposed Convention, as amended, was adopted.

Consideration of the proposed Recommendation in Report IV (2B)

PREAMBLE

121. Since no amendments were proposed, the Preamble was adopted without change.

Paragraph 1[1]

122. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

123. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "arrange for" in subparagraph (1), by the words "seek, where necessary, to establish mechanisms to encourage" so as to involve the employers and the workers in the establishment of the mechanism of information exchange. The Workers' members opposed the amendment arguing that the proposal diluted the intent, and submitted a subamendment to replace the word "arrange" by the words "establish mechanisms". The subamendment was opposed by the Employers' members who maintained that the words "where necessary" and "encourage" sought to envisage the possibility that mechanisms would have been already established. This would result in a waste of efforts in trying to re-establish such mechanisms. Following a proposal by the Government member of the United Kingdom to submit another subamendment, the Workers' members withdrew their subamendment while opting for the Office text. This was also followed by the Employers' members' withdrawal of the original amendment.

124. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to introduce a new clause to read: "medical organization and techniques for dealing with the aftermath of a major industrial accident;" as there was a wealth of medical knowledge in the past years to learn from. With the Employers' members' support, the amendment was adopted.

125. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to add a new clause to read: "the mechanisms and procedures used by competent authorities to give effect to the implementation of the Convention and Recommendation". The purpose was to assist in the implementation of the instruments and to learn from the experiences of other member States. With the support of the Employers' members and that of the Government members of the member States of the EC and other Government members, the amendment was adopted.

126. The Employers' members withdrew an amendment which sought to delete subparagraph (2) as unnecessary.

127. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words ", as far as possible," by the words "be encouraged to" in subparagraph (2) in conformity with the text approved by the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters at the 79th Session, 1992. Faced with opposition by the Employers' members and several Government members, the amendment was withdrawn.

128. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 3

129. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to delete Paragraph 3 on the grounds that the linkage to the Recommendation of a Code of Practice was not possible because of the differences in tripartite consultation procedures and that the reference to the Code in the Preamble of the Convention was sufficient. The Workers' members opposed the amendment arguing that the Code referred to was a valuable guideline to the competent authorities and the employers. The Employers' members too believed that the Code reinforced the provisions of the Convention and opposed the amendment. Faced with opposition, the amendment was withdrawn.

130. An amendment submitted by the Government members of Australia and the United States to replace the words "the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, published in 1991" by a text detailing the employers' responsibility, the competent authorities' responsibilities and the workers' rights and responsibilities, was withdrawn without discussion.

131. Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 4

132. Since no amendments were proposed, Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

New Paragraphs

133. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new paragraph to read: "Member States should develop policies aimed at addressing the major accident risks, hazards and consequences of those sectors and activities excluded from the scope of the Convention by virtue of Article 2 (1)." They argued that it would be necessary to have policies for those areas excluded from the scope of the Convention within a global strategy to prevent major industrial accidents, stressing that the amendment did not attempt to ride across the exemptions in Paragraph 1 of Article 1. This amendment was supported by Government members such as those of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Chile, Ireland, Italy, Portugal and Spain. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that the items addressed were outside the scope of the Convention and as such were irrelevant. For similar reasons, the amendment was also opposed by Government members such as those of Japan, Indonesia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. Subsequently, the Government member of the United Kingdom submitted a subamendment to insert the words ", as necessary," after the word "should", but withdrew it in the face of the opposition by both the Workers' members and the Employers' members. After further discussion, the amendment was put to vote and adopted by 139,026 votes in favour, 89,088 against and 2,204 abstentions.

134. The new Paragraph was adopted and its sequence left to the Committee Drafting Committee to determine.

135. Pursuant to a decision by the Committee to shift the discussion of an amendment submitted by

[1] The numbering of the Paragraphs reproduces that of the proposed Recommendation in Report IV (2B). It does not necessarily correspond in every case to the numbering of the Paragraphs in the proposed Recommendation reproduced at the end of the Committee's report, which is based on the decisions of the Committee and, in some cases, of the Drafting Committee.

the Workers' members for consideration as a new paragraph in the Recommendation, the Workers' members introduced a subamendment to their original text to read "Recognising that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, member States should ensure that systems are in place to compensate workers and the public as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the environment". In introducing the subamendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman assured the Committee that the text did not carry any legal implication, and that the Recommendation was not legally binding. The Employers' members maintained their opposition to the subamendment because it still involved a new concept, namely compensation which was not discussed in the Convention. The notion of compensation was covered instead by the Recommendation accompanying the Employment Injury Benefit Convention (No. 121), 1964. In the ensuing discussion, the Workers' members submitted another subamendment to delete the words "and the public" after the word "workers" and to insert the words "public and the" after the words "effects on the" so that the new text would read: "Recognizing that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, member States should ensure that systems are in place to compensate workers as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the public and the environment". Following further discussion, the Workers' members, while emphasizing the humanitarian aspect behind the notion, introduced a new subamendment and the final text read: "Recognizing that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, member States should encourage systems to compensate workers as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the public and the environment". Some Government members such as those of Japan, the United Kingdom and others opposed this subamendment. With continued opposition by the Employers' members, the subamendment was put to vote and adopted by 122,496 votes in favour, 102,312 against and 4,408 abstentions.

136. The new Paragraph, as subamended, was adopted and its sequence left to the Committee Drafting Committee to determine.

137. The proposed Recommendation, as amended, was adopted.

RESOLUTION

138. The Working Party referred to in paragraph 21 of this Report submitted a draft Resolution on Safety in the Use of Biological Agents at Work for consideration by the Committee. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to expand the scope of the Resolution from only the use of biological agents to include the exposure of workers to the hazards of biological agents. The Workers' members, and several Government members supported the amendment. The text was adopted and referred to the Committee Drafting Committee to include the words "exposure to and" before the words "use of biological agents" as appropriate.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention, the Proposed Recommendation and a Resolution

139. In the course of the consideration of paragraphs 1 to 138 of the draft report, some alterations with a view to clarifying, specifying, correcting or completing the text of various paragraphs were suggested by several members of the Committee.

140. Subject to modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the report unanimously.

141. The Committee unanimously adopted the proposed Convention as a whole.

142. Several Government members proposed to replace the word "promote" by the words "encourage the establishment of" in Paragraph 5 in the proposed Recommendation so as to retain the intent of the original text agreed upon by the Committee. Their proposal was agreed upon, and the Committee unanimously adopted the proposed Recommendation as a whole.

143. The Committee unanimously adopted a Resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work.

144. The Government member of the Netherlands noted that while his Government had reservations about some of the provisions of both the proposed Convention and Recommendation, a majority of the Committee was in favour of adopting the instruments and stated that his Government would be in favour of their adoption by the Conference. He observed that the said provisions would make it difficult for his Government to ratify it.

145. The representative of the Secretary-General congratulated the Committee members on their work which culminated in the adoption of the proposed instruments. He noted the special characteristic of the instruments which were unique in placing emphasis on the organizational measures as well as the networking arrangements at the national level.

146. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson thanked the Committee for the adoption, within the tripartite spirit, of the Convention and the Recommendation on this important subject and stressed the need for joint efforts aimed at the ratification of the Convention. She looked forward to working with the same spirit on the subject of the Resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work.

147. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also thanked the Committee members for their cooperation in arriving at the adoption of the instruments. He hoped for quick ratification of the Convention and for continued and maintained implementation of its provisions.

148. The Chairman thanked the three groups for their collaboration. He called on the delegates to continue their support for the promotion of the work in the prevention of major industrial accidents, and in particular to work hard towards the ratification of the Convention and the application of the principles set out in the Convention and Recommendation.

149. The texts of the proposed Convention, the proposed Recommendation and the resolution are produced below.

150. The Report of the Committee and the texts of the proposed Convention, the proposed Recommendation and the Resolution are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Proposed Convention concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 80th Session on 2 June 1993, and

Noting the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations and, in particular, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and the Chemicals Convention and Recommendation, 1990, and stressing the need for a global and coherent approach, and

Noting also the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991, and

Having regard to the need to ensure that all appropriate measures are taken to:

(a) prevent major accidents;

(b) minimize the risks of major accidents;

(c) minimize the effects of major accidents, and

Considering the causes of such accidents including organizational errors, the human factor, component failures, deviation from normal operational conditions, outside interference and natural forces, and

Having regard to the need for cooperation, within the International Programme on Chemical Safety, between the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Health Organization, as well as with other relevant intergovernmental organizations, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention; adopts this   day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-three the following Convention, which may be cited as the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993.

PART I. SCOPE AND DEFINITIONS

Article 1

1. The purpose of the Convention is the prevention of major accidents involving hazardous substances and the limitation of the consequences of such accidents.

2. This Convention applies to major hazard installations.

3. The Convention does not apply to:

(a) nuclear installations and plants processing radioactive substances except for facilities handling non-radioactive substances at these installations;

(b) military installations;

(c) transport outside the site of an installation other than by pipeline.

4. A Member ratifying this Convention may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned and other interested parties who may be affected, exclude from the application of the Convention installations or branches of economic activity for which equivalent protection is provided.

Article 2

Where special problems of a substantial nature arise so that it is not immediately possible to implement all the preventive and protective measures provided for in the Convention, a Member shall draw up plans, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected, for the progressive implementation of the said measures within a fixed time-frame.

Article 3

For the purposes of this Convention:

(a) the term "hazardous substance" means a substance or mixture of substances which by virtue of chemical, physical or toxicological properties, either singly or in combination, constitutes a hazard;

(b) the term "threshold quantity" means for a given hazardous substance or category of substances that quantity, prescribed in national laws and regulations by reference to specific conditions, which if exceeded identifies a major hazard installation;

(c) the term "major hazard installation" means one which produces, processes, handles, uses, disposes of or stores, either permanently or temporarily, one or more hazardous substances or categories of substances in quantities which exceed the threshold quantity;

(d) the term "major accident" means a sudden occurrence – such as a major emission, fire or explosion – in the course of an activity within a major hazard installation, involving one or more hazardous substances and leading to a serious danger to workers, the public or the environment, whether immediate or delayed;

(e) the term "safety report" means a written presentation of the technical, management and operational information covering the hazards and risks of a major hazard installation and their control and providing justification for the measures taken for the safety of the installation;

(f) the term "near miss" means any sudden event involving one or more hazardous substances which, but for mitigating effects, actions or systems, could have escalated to a major accident.

PART II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 4

1. In the light of national laws and regulations, conditions and practices, and in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers and with other interested parties who may be affected, each Member shall formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy concerning the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of major accidents.

2. This policy shall be implemented through preventive and protective measures for major hazard installations and, where practicable, shall promote the use of the best available safety technologies.

Article 5

1. The competent authority, or a body approved or recognized by the competent authority, shall, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers and other interested parties who may be affected, establish a system for the identification of major hazard installations as defined in Article 3 (c), based on a list of hazardous substances or of categories of hazardous substances or of both, together with their respective threshold quantities, in accordance with national laws and regulations or international standards.

2. The system mentioned in paragraph 1 above shall be regularly reviewed and updated.

Article 6

The competent authority, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, shall make special provision to protect confidential information transmitted or made available to it in accordance with Articles 8, 12, 13 or 14, whose disclosure would be liable to cause harm to an employer's business, so long as this provision does not lead to serious risk to the workers, the public or the environment.

PART III. RESPONSIBILITIES OF EMPLOYERS

IDENTIFICATION

Article 7

Employers shall identify any major hazard installation within their control on the basis of the system referred to in Article 5.

NOTIFICATION

Article 8

1. Employers shall notify the competent authority of any major hazard installation which they have identified:

(a) within a fixed time-frame for an existing installation;

(b) before it is put into operation in the case of a new installation.

2. Employers shall also notify the competent authority before any permanent closure of a major hazard installation.

ARRANGEMENTS AT THE LEVEL OF THE INSTALLATION

Article 9

In respect of each major hazard installation employers shall establish and maintain a documented system of major hazard control which includes provision for:

(a) the identification and analysis of hazards and the assessment of risks including consideration of possible interactions between substances;

(b) technical measures, including design, safety systems, construction, choice of chemicals, operation, maintenance and systematic inspection of the installation;

(c) organizational measures, including training and instruction of personnel, the provision of equipment in order to ensure their safety, staffing levels, hours of work, definition of responsibilities, and controls on outside contractors and temporary workers on the site of the installation;

(d) emergency plans and procedures, including:

  (i) the preparation of effective site emergency plans and procedures, including emergency medical procedures, to be applied in case of major accidents or threat thereof, with periodic testing and evaluation of their effectiveness and revision as necessary;

  (ii) the provision of information on potential accidents and site emergency plans to authorities and bodies responsible for the preparation of emergency plans and procedures for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of the installation;

  (iii) any necessary consultation with such authorities and bodies;

(e) measures to limit the consequences of a major accident;

(f) consultation with workers and their representatives.

(g) improvement of the system, including measures for gathering information and analysing accidents and near misses. The lessons so learnt shall be discussed with the workers and their representatives and shall be recorded in accordance with national law and practice.

SAFETY REPORT

Article 10

1. Employers shall prepare a safety report based on the requirements of Article 9.

2. The report shall be prepared:

(a) in the case of existing major hazard installations, within a period after notification prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(b) in the case of any new major hazard installation, before it is put into operation.

Article 11

Employers shall review, update and amend the safety report:

(a) in the event of a modification which has a significant influence on the level of safety in the installation or its processes or in the quantities of hazardous substances present;

(b) when developments in technical knowledge or in the assessment of hazards make this appropriate;

(c) at intervals prescribed by national laws or regulations;

(d) at the request of the competent authority.

Article 12

Employers shall transmit or make available to the competent authority the safety reports referred to in Articles 10 and 11.

ACCIDENT REPORTING

Article 13

Employers shall inform the competent authority and other bodies designated for this purpose as soon as a major accident occurs.

Article 14

1. Employers shall, within a fixed time-frame after a major accident, present a detailed report to the competent authority containing an analysis of the causes of the accident and describing its immediate on-site consequences, and any action taken to mitigate its effects.

2. The report shall include recommendations detailing actions to be taken to prevent a recurrence.

PART IV. RESPONSIBILITIES OF COMPETENT AUTHORITIES

OFF-SITE EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Article 15

Taking into account the information provided by the employer, the competent authority shall ensure that emergency plans and procedures containing provisions for the protection of the public and the environment outside the site of each major hazard installation are established, updated at appropriate intervals and coordinated with the relevant authorities and bodies.

Article 16

The competent authority shall ensure that:

(a) information on safety measures and the correct behaviour to adopt in the case of a major accident is disseminated to members of the public liable to be affected by a major accident without their having to request it and that such information is updated and redisseminated at appropriate intervals;

(b) warning is given as soon as possible in the case of a major accident;

(c) where a major accident could have transboundary effects, the information required in (a) and (b) above is provided to the States concerned, to assist in cooperation and coordination arrangements.

SITING OF MAJOR HAZARD INSTALLATIONS

Article 17

The competent authority shall establish a comprehensive siting policy arranging for the appropriate separation of proposed major hazard installations from working and residential areas and public facilities, and appropriate measures for existing installations. Such a policy shall reflect the General Principles set out in Part II of the Convention.

INSPECTION

Article 18

1. The competent authority shall have properly qualified and trained staff with the appropriate skills, and sufficient technical and professional support, to inspect, investigate, assess, and advise on the matters dealt with in this Convention and to ensure compliance with national laws and regulations.

2. Representatives of the employer and representatives of the workers of a major hazard installation shall have the opportunity to accompany inspectors supervising the application of the measures prescribed in pursuance of this Convention, unless the inspectors consider, in the light of the general instructions of the competent authority, that this may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties.

Article 19

The competent authority shall have the right to suspend any operation which poses an imminent threat of a major accident.

PART V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF WORKERS AND THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

Article 20

The workers and their representatives at a major hazard installation shall be consulted through appropriate cooperative mechanisms in order to ensure a safe system of work. In particular, the workers and their representatives shall:

(a) be adequately and suitably informed of the hazards associated with the major hazard installation and their likely consequences;

(b) be informed of any orders, instructions or recommendations made by the competent authority;

(c) be consulted in the preparation of, and have access to, the following documents:

  (i) the safety report;

  (ii) emergency plans and procedures;

  (iii) accident reports;

(d) be regularly instructed and trained in the practices and procedures for the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident and in the emergency procedures to be followed in the event of a major accident;

(e) within the scope of their job, and without being placed at any disadvantage, take corrective action and if necessary interrupt the activity where, on the basis of their training and experience, they have reasonable justification to believe that there is an imminent danger of a major accident, and notify their supervisor or raise the alarm, as appropriate, before or as soon as possible after taking such action.

(f) discuss with the employer any potential hazards they consider capable of generating a major accident and have the right to notify the competent authority of those hazards.

Article 21

Workers employed at the site of a major hazard installation shall:

(a) comply with all practices and procedures relating to the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident within the major hazard installation;

(b) comply with all emergency procedures should a major accident occur.

PART VI. RESPONSIBILITY OF EXPORTING STATES

Article 22

When, in an exporting member State, the use of hazardous substances, technologies or processes is prohibited as a potential source of a major accident, the information on this prohibition and the reasons for it shall be made available by the exporting member State to any importing country.

Proposed Recommendation concerning the prevention of major industrial accidents

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 80th Session on 2 June 1993, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the prevention of major industrial accidents, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993, adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-three the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Recommendation, 1993.

1. The provisions of this Recommendation should be applied in conjunction with those of the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (hereafter referred to as "the Convention").

2.(1) The International Labour Organization, in cooperation with other relevant international intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, should arrange for an international exchange of information on:

(a) good safety practices in major hazard installations including safety management and process safety;

(b) major accidents;

(c) lessons drawn from near misses;

(d) technologies and processes that are prohibited for reasons of safety and health;

(e) medical organization and techniques for dealing with the aftermath of a major industrial accident;

(f) the mechanisms and procedures used by competent authorities to give effect to the implementation of the Convention and this Recommendation.

(2) Members should, as far as possible, communicate information on the matters listed in subparagraph (1) above to the International Labour Office.

3. The national policy provided for in the Convention and the national laws and regulations or other measures to implement it should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO Code of practice on the Prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991.

4. Members should develop policies aimed at addressing the major accident risks, hazards and their consequences within the sectors and activities excluded from the scope of the Convention by virtue of Article 1, paragraph 3, thereof.

5. Recognizing that a major accident could have serious consequences in terms of its impact on human life and the environment, Members should encourage the establishment of systems to compensate workers as quickly as possible after the event and adequately address the effects on the public and the environment.

6. In accordance with the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy, adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a national or multinational enterprise with more than one establishment should provide safety measures relating to the prevention of major accidents and the control of developments likely to lead to a major accident, without discrimination, to the workers in all its establishments, regardless of the place or country in which they are situated.

Resolution concerning exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recognizing that the increasing exposure to and use of biological agents calls for an increased international awareness of the hazards and risks from those agents,

Recognizing that the increasing exposure to and use of biological agents in a wide range of processes and products require that appropriate measures are taken to minimize the risks to workers, the public and the environment;

Noting that the special nature of the hazards and risks of the exposure to and use of biological agents may require safeguards not appropriate to the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation concerning the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents and other international labour Conventions and Recommendations;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General:

(1) to take steps to address the question of exposure to and safety in the use of biological agents at work;

(2) to consider the need for new international instruments in order to minimize the risks to workers, the public and the environment.

Introduction

6. In his opening statement, the Chairman emphasized the significance of the Committee's work, in view of its tripartite composition, an ILO feature unique in the UN system, and also considering the importance which all three constituents of the Organization attached to reaching consensus on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation. He expressed the hope that the Committee would succeed in guiding the ILO's work in this important field for the years to come.

7. The Deputy Director-General responsible for technical cooperation and field programmes and Deputy Secretary-General of the Conference, welcomed the members of the Committee, the representatives of sister organizations and observers attending its sittings. She recalled the constant interest of the International Labour Conference to undertake periodic reviews of the ILO's technical cooperation programme, which had expanded rapidly in quantitative terms since the 1960s, and particularly since 1987, with resources increasing from US$112 million in 1987 to some US$170 million in 1991. Four overall reviews had been held by the Conference, the last in 1987, when the Conference adopted a resolution and a set of conclusions concerning "The Role of the ILO in Technical Cooperation", which, among other things, expressed the wish for such regular reviews to be continued. The present debate on the issue was in response to that request. Meanwhile, between these comprehensive reviews, operational activities had been kept under constant scrutiny by the regional conferences, by Industrial and Expert Committees and, in particular, by the annual meetings of the Governing Body Committee on Operational Programmes. In this connection, it should be recalled that the framework for the technical cooperation programme of the ILO had up to now been provided by the resolution and conclusions of the 1987 Conference Committee, which had emphasized the need to focus the programme on building national capacities and self-reliance, especially through human resources development, creation and strengthening of institutions, and the involvement of the social partners in the development process. The resolution had also encouraged the Office to do fewer things better, to increase emphasis on longer-term projects, and to concentrate on specific result-oriented programmes based on the comparative advantage of the ILO, its tripartite structure and its mandate. Another priority theme specifically identified for concentration by the Office had been the promotion of international labour standards. The resolution had furthermore stated that employment promotion and human resources development should continue to be at the forefront of ILO concerns and that there should be a general increase in the programme scope and share of resources devoted to the least-developed countries. The promotion of tripartism had also been highlighted strongly in the resolution. It could therefore be said that the historical picture presented in the Director-General's Report before the Committee reflected the focus which had been set by the 1987 resolution.

8. Taking a broad look at the technical cooperation programme since the overall review by the Conference in 1987, the Deputy Secretary-General confirmed that the strong interest and support on the part of constituents and partners had paid off in terms of the quality and quantity of programmes implemented. Operational resources had risen in 1991, thus enabling the ILO to undertake a broad range of activities including, amongst others, the provision of fellowships administered by the Turin Centre. A constant concern was ensuring high quality and substance and, hence, the relevance of the programme in the face of changing political and economic circumstances. Judging by the demand for services, the programme could be considered relevant and successful. Constituents, as well as other UN agencies and financial institutions, had increasingly made use of ILO experience and capacity in employment promotion, human resources development and social protection as they relate to economic and social reform programmes in developing countries and in the economies in transition. Those services had helped to make the adjustment process less painful for many countries faced with the dramatic effects of social and economic changes which accompanied the dismantling of an ideologically divided world. Throughout the process, governments, and employers' and workers' organizations at national and international levels had been consulted in the firm belief that if technical cooperation was to lead to rapid economic growth, higher levels of employment, and better living conditions for all, it must be defined and implemented in a spirit of close partnership. There was always room for improvement and the Office counted on the advice of this Committee for ways and means to improve performance, especially in response to the dramatic changes which had taken place in the world. Stimulated by such initiatives as the Nordic UN Project, changes had taken place in the perception and in the modalities of multilateral technical cooperation within the United Nations system. These were reflected, in particular, in decisions taken by the UNDP Governing Council which had introduced national execution, the programme approach in defining country programmes and strategies, better coordination mechanisms at the country level, and new support cost arrangements. Equally relevant were the discussions at ECOSOC and at the UN General Assembly on the issue of financing the UN system's operational activities. All of these developments were likely to have a serious impact on the nature of ILO technical cooperation programmes and on resources available for them.

9. Returning to relations with donors, the Deputy Secretary-General stated that, at present, the resource situation was in a state of flux and prospects uncertain. UNDP's expenditure targets for the Fifth Programming Cycle 1992-96 had been drastically reduced, accompanied by a shift in activities from project to programmes and the introduction of national execution as the preferred modality. Increasingly, the ILO was engaged in offering policy advice at the programme level; nationally executed projects also require, at times, backstopping by the ILO. The end result was decreasing involvement in the administration of projects. Consequently, UNDP resources for ILO-executed activities had been declining and were likely to continue to do so in the near future. On the other hand, reliable and predictable resource flows were expected under trust fund arrangements with multi-bilateral donors, international development banks and, in some cases, recipient governments themselves. As it was necessary to have access to sufficient resources to support the ILO's operational activities within the framework of the active partnership policy, the Office intended to maintain and strengthen its dialogue with multi-bilateral donors, bearing in mind their support for the ILO's essential activities in areas such as the promotion of tripartism and international labour standards. In addition, important contacts had been established with the European Community which, it was hoped, would bear fruit in the not too distant future.

10. In response to the new challenges, the Director-General had taken a number of measures which were designed to render operations more constituent-led, demand-driven, relevant and cost-effective. The document which the Director-General had presented to the Governing Body at its 252nd session (March, 1992) on the links between technical cooperation and international labour standards should be considered in this connection. The proposals contained in this document, which had been endorsed, emphasized the need for technical cooperation activities to cluster more tightly around the core mandate of the ILO and for greater synergy to be created between the international labour standards and the technical cooperation programme. The Director-General had also set in motion a policy of active partnership, the purpose of which was to bring the ILO closer to its constituents in order to better respond to their priorities and needs. This partnership, which implied a closer working relationship with constituents, required that changes be made which would improve the Office's analytical capacity to diagnose problems and provide policy advice and solutions. This, it was expected, would also enable the Office to act more effectively and flexibly in dealing with the needs of the tripartite constituency in member States, thus making the impact of the ILO's work better known while maintaining the overall unity of the Organization. In this connection, ILO Office directors should assume major responsibility for ILO operational activities, in particular through the formulation, in close cooperation with ILO constituents, of country strategies for social development of the countries. The necessary technical and policy advice would be provided by 14 multidisciplinary teams (MDTs) which would be strategically located in all regions. The composition and activities of these teams would be adapted over time in accordance with the specific needs of the countries. Each team would include specialists on international labour standards and labour legislation as well as on employers' and workers' activities. Field offices and the MDTs would jointly develop the ILO's operational strategy at the country level, based on a programme approach, in close consultation with the tripartite constituency, and assist the country in the pursuance of those development objectives which fall within the core areas of the ILO's mandate. The fundamental principles of this policy, its objectives and instruments had been elaborated in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 and placed before the Conference for approval.

11. The report before the Committee presented the major themes to be addressed as follows: democratization through revitalized tripartite participation; the protection of working people; and the fight against poverty. A number of major issues specifically needed careful consideration and required the guidance of the Committee. The first such question was to ensure that the international community and especially the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the European Community, the UNDP and other sister organizations within the United Nations system, have full access to ILO experience and skills in the social field. This would guarantee that the drive for greater economic efficiency and growth remains sensitive to the social concerns, thereby leading to greater equity in the distribution of benefits and more effective social protection. The second related to the likely resource constraints already alluded to earlier, and on which the Committee could provide valuable advice. Lastly, it would be important to enhance the contribution of the Governing Body to the management of the technical cooperation programme, as part of the reform of its work by way of a Technical Cooperation Committee with expanded terms of reference, thus improving upon the work of the former Committee on Operational Programmes. Moreover, the Committee might wish to give guidance as well on the suggested points for discussion contained in the report before it.

General discussion

12. The Committee devoted four sittings to the general discussion of trends and issues relating to technical cooperation. The debate included both general aspects and specific topics which were subsequently examined in depth during the chapter-by-chapter discussion of the report.

13. Many members of the Committee found the report submitted by the Office to be relevant, comprehensive and reflecting all important developments and questions allowing the Committee to draw appropriate conclusions and providing guidance for the future orientation of the ILO's operational activities. Whereas it was generally recognized that the descriptive and quantitative analysis included in the report was a useful basis for discussion, some members would have wished the qualitative and impact analysis to have been more prominent.

14. There was unanimity among members of the Committee as to the timeliness and appropriateness of a discussion on technical cooperation at the present session of the Conference. Since 1987, when the issue had last been debated by the Conference, many and far-reaching changes had taken place, both in the economic and social situation of member States in all parts of the world, and in respect of policies and approaches for multilateral and bilateral cooperation globally. The worsening economic environment, combined with the trend towards globalization and interdependence had made it more difficult for developing countries and for countries with economies in transition to achieve their social and developmental objectives of progress and equity. As the ILO's role in assisting these countries in dealing with the challenges and difficulties confronting them was of crucial importance, the future direction and modalities of its technical cooperation programme would benefit from a comprehensive review by and guidance from the Committee. In this connection many members welcomed the general thrust of the report, which contained proposals already examined by the Governing Body on several recent occasions, as well as those reflected in the proposed Programme and Budget for the 1994-95 biennium. They particularly noted the greater emphasis on a coherent, relevant, and effective framework, to be based on the needs expressed by the tripartite membership, and to be implemented by a reinforced field structure of the ILO.

15. On behalf of his group, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that he considered the inclusion of technical cooperation on the agenda of the Conference as most timely and opportune, taking into account the various social and economic developments which had occurred since 1987, and as an opportunity to relate to the Preamble of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia and review some of those objectives. His group was of the view that the most important objectives to be pursued by the ILO were the elimination of poverty and want, support to employers' and workers' organizations, the creation of productive employment and the promotion of an enabling environment necessary for economic development and social progress. In all these fields, the ILO should be more responsive to the needs expressed by its constituents.

16. Referring to the links between international labour standards and technical cooperation, he pointed out the principles on which those standards were ratified and effectively applied, and the fact that conventions and recommendations were not ends in themselves. His group took it that the views contained in the Office document as regards the promotion of complementarity between standards and technical cooperation as an underlying objective for all operational activities did not imply conditionality. Tripartism was recognized by the Employers' group as the backbone and principal comparative advantage of the ILO and as fundamental to its mandate. He also suggested that, in addition to being applied to social and labour issues, tripartism should extend to the full range of social and economic issues, including alleviation of poverty, creation of productive employment, improving productivity and industrial peace. In this regard, it was important for those issues to be highlighted in negotiations with the international financial institutions.

17. The Employers' Vice-Chairman welcomed changes in technical cooperation and especially the introduction of the concept of multidisciplinary teams and multidisciplinarity. This new approach had many advantages such as bringing ILO services closer to the target groups and encouraging optimum use of human and financial resources. Its successful implementation would depend on setting up appropriate coordination mechanisms. Considerable challenges were facing the ILO in the 1990s, among which were the need to adapt the ILO's policies to new UN orientations and to programmes developed by other agencies and NGOs; to improve and strengthen the Organization's image and to bring its services closer to its constituents; and, finally, to continue to promote tripartism and in particular the involvement of the social partners in national execution of technical cooperation activities, as well as reinforcing activities for the benefit of employers' organizations.

18. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of his group, considered that democracy was prospering while the world economic situation was in crisis. This was explained by the fact of the interdependence between the economies of the countries and new global challenges. The ILO still had an important role to play in responding to these challenges, particularly with respect to the fight against poverty which represented a real danger for all. The speaker, referring to the Constitution of the ILO and to the Philadelphia Declaration, emphasized the importance which the Organization must continue to attach to international labour standards. The Workers' group held the view that the promotion, and more so, the application of standards constituted guarantees for democracy and socio-economic development.

19. The Workers' group supported the position on the links between international labour standards and technical cooperation set out in the document on which a consensus had emerged in the Governing Body in March 1992 and which should be implemented. On the subject of the role of the ILO within the United Nations system, the Organization's structure, and particularly tripartism, rendered it unique and provided a model with which economic and social problems, especially poverty, could be tackled. Given the unique character of the ILO, the Workers' group reiterated its support for activities aimed at the reinforcement of tripartism and the strengthening of the social partners. He expressed satisfaction with the quality of the report submitted to the Committee, noting that generally it addressed the concerns of his group. The new priorities for the 1990s, outlined in Chapter III of the report, were found especially topical. He was confident that the Committee would succeed in arriving at a consensus in concluding its work.

20. The representative of the Secretary-General, in his response to the general discussion, noted that many speakers had deemed the report useful for discussion and had asked for additional information on a number of questions. He pointed out that if the report had some shortcomings, this was due to the fact that it had to be drafted at a time when sweeping changes were taking place in the world at large, in the UN system, and in the ILO. Highlighting the true impact of programmes and presenting data thematically or by region was at present difficult to achieve, as the programme was still structured around activities at the project level. This would change under the new arrangements being implemented under the active partnership policy, and work had already started to ensure that planning and evaluation would be undertaken in a systematic manner, under a single reporting approach encompassing assessment from the basic project level to overall Governing Body monitoring, through its new Committee on Technical Cooperation and by the Conference. He had also taken careful note of the comments and stimulating debate concerning the objectives of the programme which essentially covered democratization and support to social partners; protection of workers in line with the traditional role of the ILO including also progressively for the informal sector; and, as the third high-priority objective, the promotion of employment and the struggle against poverty.

21. As regards the links between technical cooperation and standards, which should be conceived as complementary, positive and constructive, the Office had deployed considerable efforts through systematic briefing of experts and through meetings and seminars in the countries where technical cooperation activities were being carried out, as well as through the training activities of the Turin Centre where modules on standards were systematically included in courses. In addition, an expert on international labour standards would be assigned to each of the MDTs.

22. As regards multidisciplinarity, the Office had already begun to define the ILO position on some substantive policy areas which went beyond individual technical departments, such as on structural adjustment and on child labour. Others would follow on a number of topical problems. It has been decided to create a working party which will meet following the Conference until October and which will convene specialists from technical departments and MDTs. They will look at a series of recent missions so as to carefully examine how the work could have been done in a more integrated fashion.

23. Concerning the numbers of staff to be assigned to posts in the MDTs, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that, for the total of 14 teams, there would be in all 128 expert posts. Of these posts, 83 would be filled by regional advisers or members of regional teams already serving in the regions and 45 by having recourse to staff rotation and recruitment. In programming the 1994-95 budget, resources had been increased for regional departments in order to achieve such staff redeployment. Activities at headquarters and those in the field carried out by the MDTs would not be cut off from each other, as members of the teams would be coming from technical departments, maintain close contacts with these, and rotate between MDTs and headquarters.

24. Tripartite participation in each of the MDTs would be reinforced in part also by the presence of experts on employers' and workers' questions. Directors of ILO offices would be responsible, within the general objectives of the ILO, for negotiation of joint objectives with the governments, the employers and the workers in each country, through active partnership. The principle of tripartism would fully apply with respect to planning and implementation of country objectives and programmes, more so than it was possible to achieve with individual projects.

25. The new policy had evolved since 1991, and various studies and consultations undertaken in Geneva and in the field with which all concerned had been closely associated. This extensive process had fed into two workshops in Turin to which all directors of the technical departments, regional directors, area office directors and heads of MDTs had actively contributed. Why did we not start with a pilot project? There had in fact been some experience under way as the first team was functioning in Budapest. However, it was important to underline that the Office was required to serve all member States equitably and that a pilot approach was therefore not considered appropriate.

26. As a result of the new UNDP modalities and overall UNDP resource constraints, ILO extra-budgetary resources for technical cooperation started decreasing from 1991. This was very preoccupying and risked jeopardizing some of the programmes of the ILO. The Office was making efforts, with some success, to find other sources of funding especially from multi-bilateral donors and from the Bretton Woods institutions. Joint activities had been undertaken with the IMF recently in sector review missions in Costa Rica, India and Zimbabwe with a view to reinforcing the social dimension in the structural adjustment process. Large ILO projects were being financed from loans and credits of the World Bank/International Development Association (IDA) in many countries. In addition, the ILO was making efforts to have a policy-level dialogue with these institutions and to be active as well in the implementation of their activities.

27. Finally, on the issue of coordination within the United Nations system, the ILO had been playing a pioneering role and advanced role. The reforms envisaged in the active partnership policy and by changes in its working methods could be cited in this regard, as these were stressing general policy-level advisory services, shifting emphasis from projects to programmes, having more recourse to national experts, whose numbers had doubled since 1987, and by defining country objectives. The ILO would thus make an important contribution to the establishment of the concept of country strategies which the United Nations has decided on as a common UN system frame of reference.

Objectives and priorities for the ILO technical cooperation programme

(a) Substantive priorities

28. During the chapter-by-chapter discussion, the Committee heard a considerable number of interventions related to the review of the objectives, thrust and priorities of the technical cooperation programme contained in the Director-General's background report, particularly in Chapter II. On the whole, there was agreement with both the substantive and the regional priorities identified in the report.

29. Some speakers recalled that in determining priorities and shaping programmes, the ILO needed to attune itself to the perceptions and choices of its constituents. It was from their stated perceptions, including those expressed in the framework of the International Labour Conference, regional conferences, the Governing Body and other Expert meetings, that an ILO operational programme emerged. The ILO programme had expanded not merely in response to resource supply but primarily because the Office had responded to an increased number of requests made by member States.

30. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of his group, emphasized that the initial broad objectives embodied in the Preamble to the ILO's Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia needed to be reviewed in the light of new challenges of the current decade and, notably, that of employment creation. This, in turn, called for support to enterprise development and the creation of an enabling environment. Unemployment and underemployment were affecting not only the developing world but also the industrialized economies as well as new member States of the Organization. The technical cooperation programme of the ILO in the 1990s could not remain insensitive to emerging social issues such as rapid population growth, the deteriorating quality of working life, and the need for effective leadership training which all needed to be integrated into ILO programmes and translated into operational terms.

31. Several speakers emphasized that in pursuing its objectives the Organization was faced with some additional daunting tasks, namely integrating into its work the promotion of democracy in all regions, of observance of human rights and of participatory approaches. Countries embarking on this path stood to benefit from a climate favourable to tripartism and from social institutions that had a clear vision and commitment to social dialogue. The ILO should refocus its attention and resources and propose practical ways by which the development of social institutions and the creation of a favourable environment could be fostered. This was particularly critical in times of structural adjustment which had inflicted additional hardships upon the developing countries particularly for vulnerable groups in society and generally for those that could not rely on structured and representative organizations. It was pointed out that workers in the informal sector of the economy, including a large number of self-employed women heads of households in rural settings, had virtually no representative organizations to provide support and press their views. A Worker member speaking on behalf of his group, raised the question of the ILO's involvement in the structural adjustment process. In this regard, the ILO should not only mitigate social suffering through, inter alia, the creation of "safety nets", but also exercise, through a closer dialogue, influence on the Bretton Woods institutions. An example of a useful, though "defensive" action, was cited by the Government member of Egypt who mentioned the Fund for Social Development established in her country in the context of the ongoing adjustment process.

32. Several speakers, mainly from donor countries and from the Workers' group, felt that if the Organization was more clearly perceived to be focusing on the basic needs of the poorest segments of the working population, it could expect the donor community to respond more generously. In this context some Workers' members felt that past ILO response in seemingly scattered directions in such fields as transfer of technology, enhanced productivity and improved production methods had not been particularly useful and, according to the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group, were not necesarily perceived as beneficial from a worker's viewpoint. Moreover, it was also stated that some other agencies, inside and outside the United Nations system, were better placed to work in these areas. The ILO was facing a dilemma of forging, on the one hand, its global image of a social conscience whilst, on the other, seeking to establish its authority in purely economic fields. As economic themes had tended to take ascendancy over social ones, such core mandate objectives as the promotion of sound industrial relations systems and an improved working environment were not given adequate attention. However, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of his group, and several other members emphasized that any attempt at establishing a rigid distinction between economic and social objectives would be detrimental to both the ILO's programme and its image. The response to structural adjustment, for instance, required a thorough understanding of the interaction between economic and social variables and issues. The fight against poverty by way of employment creation schemes and human resource development could only be achieved through a proper blending of social and economic concerns in a tripartite process.

33. Several speakers reflected on the ILO's future role in relation to human resources development and emphasized the now widely recognized policy of empowerment which became critical in the wake of economic restructuring, for instance in the new states in Central and Eastern Europe as well as in other countries shifting from centrally planned to market economies. Empowerment, it was pointed out, did not consist only of transferring initial or additional skills, but should be seen as a lifelong process enabling individuals and groups in all sectors, branches and levels of the economy to adjust to the new economic and social realities, with due account being taken of technological changes that rendered previously acquired skills and established methods obsolescent in relatively short periods. Several speakers strongly advocated the promotion of women-specific programmes, as well as the integration of gender issues into the mainstream of the ILO's operational activities. Women, it was argued, should be more instrumental in carrying out operational activities, not only as beneficiaries but also as resource persons. They should accordingly be appropriately represented in the MDTs.

34. Some members highlighted the fact that many social programmes pursued by member States had not succeeded because they failed to consider, from the design stage, the conditions necessary for sustainability, which was now recognized by the international community as one of the key prerequisites in promoting a relevant strategy. Some speakers recalled in this connection the attention given to NGOs and the social partners by the principal development agencies, citing in particular the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED), convened in Rio de Janeiro in 1992. There was a growing awareness of the contribution of workers' and employers' organizations to achieving sustainable growth.

35. Speakers from all groups stressed that tripartism be recognized as a major concern for ILO technical coperation and that adequate resources be allocated to the programmes addressing the needs of the social partners. They were aware of the fact that governments had not always been forthcoming in supporting programmes for the social partners under UNDP financing and that these programmes consequently relied heavily on support from multi-bilateral donors. An example of technical support which both Employers' and Workers' members felt was relevant concerned the establishment and strengthening, within their respective organizations, of research and study capacity to enable them to contribute effectively to national dialogue and negotiations regarding social and economic policies or programmes. Other speakers highlighted the unique contribution of workers' cooperatives that dealt with a wide range of vital workers' needs. They felt that the Office report should have given greater emphasis to this important category of voluntary organizations because of their unique contribution to job creation and generally to social and economic development. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the Office report was completed several months before the expert meeting on cooperatives took place, and it had consequently not been possible to include the conclusions derived from that meeting.

36. Several speakers requested that some of the major substantive priority themes, already identified during the 1987 Conference debate, should be reiterated because they had lost nothing of their relevance. It was noted that the informal sector should receive greater attention than in the past, as should activities aimed at the disabled, women, migrants, youth and victims of apartheid. Speakers from several donor countries and the other groups drew particular attention to the need to strengthen the ILO's operational activities designed to eliminate child labour, in such a manner as to not condemn children and their families to death and starvation. Specific mention was made by one speaker of the need to promote wider understanding and better application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). One Employer speaker felt that on such a cardinal theme the Employers' and Workers' programmes of the Organization joined hands and promoted a bipartite concerted action. A Workers' member emphasized that combat against child labour was closely intertwined with furthering a gender-specific approach. She also felt that each MDT should include an expert on child labour issues, that appropriate policy research should be carried out on the subject of child labour and that a tripartite approach was particularly appropriate in this field.

37. Similarily, the need to strengthen labour administration and labour ministries in general, whilst recognized and documented in the 1987 Conclusions, had to be re-emphasized, particularly at a time when the international community was expecting the labour administration systems to play a more prominent role, both in respect of their traditional protective functions and in relation to the adoption, ratification and, above all, application of ILO standards. Referring to the need for ILO to concentrate on its core mandate and the underlying notion of being a "centre of excellence", many speakers from donor and developing countries pointed out that a full recognition of and concentration on the ILO's comparative advantages was required. Many members argued that the requirement of the ILO doing fewer things better should be strongly reiterated in the light of experience gained and evidence available. The representative of the Secretary-General, in response to questions raised during the debate, informed the Committee of the Office's approach to the subject of the core mandate, which was indeed of growing concern to the Office, emphasizing that it was, basically, a response to wishes and resolutions taken by ILO constituents themselves within the framework of, for instance, the International Labour Conference, the regional conferences and other competent bodies. In the process the Office had at times accepted to scale down certain technical programmes, the pursuit of which would have distracted human and material resources from more genuine ILO technical fields in need of additional support. The attainment of excellence, in turn, required the formulation of bench-marks and other indicators of achievement as well as rigorous application of high standards for delivery and evaluation of technical programmes.

38. As regards policy dialogue, several speakers recalled that in the application of recent United Nations General Assembly resolutions as well as of a series of decisions taken by the UNDP Governing Council and ECOSOC, specialized agencies were now urged to emphasize their policy advisory function. The issue of new modalities of execution and successor arrangements, mobilized agencies' capacities to provide high-level policy advice and specific technical support services in their fields of competence.

Mention was made, inter alia, by the Government member of Sweden, of pioneering work undertaken by headquarters in relation to labour intensive rural and urban works programmes and the informal sector in support of the view that there was a need to preserve research capability at headquarters, thus complementing policy formulation and empirical research undertaken by the ILO's field structure and the MDTs.

39. Some members called for short-term emergency and relief activities not to be neglected, within the limits of the ILO's mandate and resources. Reference was made in this connection to conclusions reached at the recent 13th Conference of Asia and Pacific Labour Ministers (CAPLAM), held in Teheran, which specifically requested the ILO to give urgent assistance to war ravaged countries in the region.

(b) Regional priorities

40. All speakers found the regional distribution of the ILO technical cooperation programme largely to be balanced and in harmony with past resolutions and decisions taken by the ILO tripartite constituency. Several African speakers felt that the plight of LDCs should be given greater attention and resources, and one speaker regretted the downward trend in allocation to the LDCs revealed by the data in the report. In his reply, the representative of the Secretary-General, however, recalled that the level of assistance had remained fairly stable over the years representing roughly one-third of the total annual expenditure on operational activities.

41. Several speakers from the Asia and Pacific region, whilst endorsing the thrust of the ILO regional programme, recalled that in this vast region, the majority of people lived in rural areas. Accepting that the ILO had a mission to perform for the organized sector as well as the urban informal sector, adequate attention was also necessary with respect to outlying areas of the countries where, moreover, women assumed an unduly large economic burden. Recalling the needs of the Arab States, some members requested that the situation of the workers in the occupied territories should also be given due attention. Several members, mainly from the African region, urged the Office to maintain the pressure on South Africa, designed to bring an early end to apartheid. Several speakers also dealt with the ILO's support to countries in Central and Eastern Europe. There was a wide measure of agreement that the Organization had to respond to the circumstances prevailing in these countries particularly in terms of providing policy advice for the promotion of social institutions, labour legislation, social protection and improvements of the working environment. In this connection, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled that support to this group of countries relied principally on additional funding from extra-budgetary resources and, furthermore, essentially also took the form of policy advice. It had in no way prejudiced ILO's commitment to the other developing regions and, notably, to Africa where nearly half of the annual expenditure of the Organization was incurred. In this connection, the Employers' member from Lebanon suggested that Arab countries in Africa should also be included in activities targeted at the Arab region. Finally, in this region, problems arising from forced or voluntary migration should also be duly considered.

42. Several Government members, while endorsing the country focus of ILO's operational activities, urged the Organization to bring the international perspective truly to bear on its country-focused programmes as this was one of the comparative advantages of ILO as a multilateral and universal agency. Several speakers also stressed that the unity of ILO action should be preserved, particulrly at a time when devolution of implementation and a stronger technical presence in the field were being undertaken.

43. All speakers felt that in addressing thematic or regional activities, the ILO programme had to consider the domestic capacity of the recipient countries as a crucial condition; this applied mutatis mutandis to all three ILO constituents. Where countries did not possess the necessary human or material resources, it was unrealistic to circumscribe ILO's support merely to providing high-level policy advice whilst expecting the country to mount its own operational activities that required complex organizational and conceptual skills and capacities. National capacity building was therefore a paramount consideration that had to be carefully assessed at the outset of the activities when objectives were formulated, and during all subsequent stages of the support process.

Complementarity between international labour standards and technical cooperation

44. The relationship between international labour standards and technical cooperation, extensively debated throughout the Committee work, has already been touched upon in the introduction. During the debate on the different chapters of the report, many speakers reverted to the subject offering nuances, clarifications and interpretations that they felt were pertinent to this discussion. Recurrent references were made to the document submitted to and the debate held during the 252nd Session of the Governing Body (March 1992). The Employers' members reiterated their fundamental position which, in substance, consisted of rejecting any attempt at imposing conditionality on technical assistance related to the ratification or observance of international labour standards. Standards were means and not ends in themselves. They felt, furthermore, that there was ground to distinguish between so-called essential standards and others often too detailed or presupposing a level of development which many countries had not reached yet. The key to the issue was not a rigid, but a flexible approach. The Organization stood to benefit from an in-depth examination of the reasons for non-compliance by certain member States, bearing in mind that lack of good will definitely was not the root cause. Recalling earlier views on this matter, speakers from the Employers' group stressed that the issue of ratification was very complex. Merely taking the number of ratifications as an indicator of commitment to international labour standards or social progress was inadequate. Indeed, some member States, in the words of one Employers' speaker, had chosen to ratify without adequate consideration of human or economic implications. Countries were now far more cautious in their attitude to accepting further ratifications. In the view of the Employers' group, economic consequences of ratification should be pointed out to governments by the ILO, as in the case of the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131). Under no circumstances should the ratification of a convention discourage investment and development. It was recalled in this connection that a correlation could not be established between the number of ratified conventions and the social progress made by a particular country. Also, the current adjustment process was hardly conducive to acceptance of new social obligations and, in this perspective, the ILO's assistance to member States should be directed at protecting workers in a realistic and feasible fashion.

45. In reacting to the views expressed by the Employers' group, the Workers' Vice-Chairman had on several occasions recalled, on behalf of his group, the origin and nature of the understanding, which had been reached when the matter was discussed in the Governing Body in March 1992. He reaffirmed the fundamental commitment of his group to the promotion of international labour standards, their universal character and their relevance to all workers, regardless of economic sector or branch of activity, who should enjoy adequate social protection.

46. The majority of speakers felt that the discussion had led to an understanding the notion of complementarity, always pursued in the light of prevailing circumstances, in order to achieve maximum acceptance and effectiveness. Several members recalled that linkage of technical cooperation, at project level, to principles embodied in international labour standards, lent added significance to the universal character of the Organization. Country-specific knowledge with particular reference to the economic and social conditions would be enhanced by the proximity of subregional MDTs, further reinforced by the inclusion, in each team, of experts on workers' and employers' questions, as well as on international labour standards. In this connection, the Government member of the United Kingdom wondered whether the autonomy enjoyed by the subregional teams would not result in undue emphasis on ratification or application. Furthermore, the type and nature of some forms of operational activities did not lend themselves to standard promotion.

47. Other members, including the Government member of Australia, were of the view that complementarity would enrich the quality of policy advice provided by the ILO to its tripartite constituents. It would have the added advantage of ensuring that the support of the ILO was related as closely as possible to the core mandate of the Organization.

48. One Worker member wished to distinguish between inability to abide by universal principles embodied in standards and cases of grave and flagrant violation of the ILO's standards. He said that the latter did justify a more rigorous stance by the ILO but this interpretation was considered ill-advised by several Employers' members who insisted that the notion of conditionality should not be applied under any circumstances. Countries only stood to benefit from a positive dialogue in which technical cooperation was itself a powerful instrument, not to be scaled down or discontinued, for any reason whatsoever.

Promotion of tripartism and social dialogue

49. Throughout the debate, issues connected with the promotion of tripartism in technical cooperation were touched upon by members of all groups, many of whom had found the report to be comprehensive and thorough on this subject. The debate focused in particular on issues in relation to the following circumstances: tripartite participation in the context of the shift from planned to market economies taking place in the various regions; the structure and principles of tripartism and their repercussions on the democratization process with particular emphasis on new independent republics in Central and Eastern Europe; the interdependence between tripartite participation, international labour standards, and technical cooperation, already referred to in a previous section of this report; the future involvement of workers' and employers' organizations in the structural adjustment process and, finally, the importance of including tripartite dimensions in the newly conceived active partnership policy, in general, and in the multidisciplinary teams in particular.

50. Many speakers agreed that a tripartite approach was not only a "feature" or "characteristic" of the ILO's mandate and structure but principal among its comparative advantages.

51. Several members emphasized the discrepancy that sometimes occurred between commitment to the tripartite process at international level and that observed at national level. In developing countries in particular, difficulties facing workers' and employers' organizations often prevented them from making optimal contributions or participating in the shaping of new policies and programmes. This was illustrated by their insufficient involvement in the structural adjustment process which was often conducted without the social partners, not necessarily due to lack of good will on the part of governments or of the Bretton Woods institutions, but essentially because of the difficulties encountered by the social partners to research, analyse and present their views forcefully. In this context, both Employers' and Workers' members insisted on applying the tripartite approach beyond the traditional programme of assistance and even to go beyond the range of operational activities. The Employers' member for Jordan, supported by other members, mentioned the need to set up and support research and studies units capable of substantiating the position of the social partners in the face of legislative or policy proposals discussed at national level in the context of structural adjustment or any other dialogue on social and economic issues.

52. Many speakers felt that in the framework of the ILO's technical cooperation programme, tripartism should be interpreted not only in narrow terms as a method or an approach but rather as a fundamental feature of democracy. This had particular significance in the case of countries embarking on profound democratic reforms in Eastern and Central Europe, but was also valid elsewhere. In this context, several members of the three groups recalled instances of contacts and exchanges between workers' and employers' organizations from industrialized countries and their Central and Eastern European counterparts which had covered structural and legal aspects, as well as financial and organizational arrangements.

53. Many speakers offered suggestions concerning the approach of the Office to the promotion of tripartite concerns vis-à-vis other United Nations agencies and the Bretton Woods institutions. Mention was made in this context of the fact that tripartism was little known or understood outside the limited sphere of the Organization. As a result, the Organization had a daunting advocacy role to play in its dialogue with these development partners, inside and outside the UN system. Recalling an Understanding in 1988 between the Chairmen of the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Governing Body and the then Associate Administrator of the UNDP regarding tripartite participation in UNDP-funded programmes, some members regretted the limited practical impact of this Understanding so far. A number of speakers referred to the policy dialogue between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions, which evidently had faced even greater difficulties in terms of enlisting support for tripartite themes and for enhancing the social content of structural adjustment programmes. The Government member of the United Kingdom urged that the dialogue take place at all possible levels namely at top management level, between headquarters of the organizations, at country level and, above all, between specialists from both organizations. In confirming that this was indeed a preoccupation for the Office, the representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee of numerous efforts made, at different levels. In reply to a question about the role of the MDTs in this regard, he cited the example of several instances of contacts between the first operational MDT (in Budapest) and representatives of the Bretton Woods institutions.

54. Several speakers commended the Office on the strong emphasis it clearly placed on a tripartite dimension in the work of the MDTs. As might be expected, they regarded as positive all attempts designed to refocus and reconcentrate the ILO's operational activities on key priority themes which, in turn, implied more intense involvement of the social partners in the identification of country objectives in the formulation of country-focused programmes and generally, in the implementation and evaluation of operational activities. Partnership, it was recalled should indeed be active, but above all equitable as regards the social partners who should be considered and treated as equal partners. Some Employers' members in this connection suggested that as privatization was gaining momentum in many countries and expertise was needed in this complex area, including the creation of micro-enterprises and fostering of entrepreneurship, the ILO could draw upon qualified expert capability available to certain employers' organizations. Likewise, workers' organizations were in a position to offer expert advice to certain ILO programmes such as those concerned with gender issues, child labour and the informal sector. Some members suggested that the Office build up a compendium of local expertise available at country level as part of its overall effort to enhance the local/national content of international development programmes; this should apply to expertise to be drawn from workers' and employers' organizations as, indeed, from other sources and backgrounds.

55. Several members asked that ILO programmes in support of the social partners be more specific, contending that the information contained in the Office's report was somewhat vague. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of his group, felt that the report conveyed the impression that the type of support given to workers' organizations was not the same as that offered to employers' organizations. There was too narrow a focus as far as support to workers' organizations was concerned as no indications had been given regarding the monitoring and measurement of activities. They also urged that employers' and workers' organizations should channel their requests for support directly to the ILO, recalling that this established principle was not always observed. Employers' and Workers' members of MDTs should retain strong links with their respective liaison bureaux at headquarters. Some members stressed that the social partners should be more actively associated with the debate on national capacity-building and investment in human resources so as not to focus exclusively or primarily on government-related activities. This would be in line with the unique structure and mandate of the ILO while, at the same time, it would redress the relative paucity of resources being allocated to the promotion of employers' and workers' organizations.

Key management issues

56. Some issues related to the overall management of the ILO's programmes were extensively dealt with during the general discussion. Certain management issues relative to the emergence of new priorities, and to management structure created under the active partnership, are summarized in other parts of this report. In addressing key management issues, members of the Committee paid particular attention to the questions of (a) ensuring a sustainable funding base for the programme; (b) monitoring and implementation of the programme; (c) evaluation, lessons learned and feedback; and, finally, (d) effective coordination.

(a) Ensuring a sustainable funding base for the programme

57. Speakers from all groups dealt with the financial prospects for a continued vigorous and relevant ILO technical cooperation programme. They all expressed concern over the looming downhill trend after years of uninterrupted growth. It was realised that most recent financial indications regarding approvals and expenditures, revealed that there was substantial decline in resources. In stressing, however, their commitment to the policy of national execution and capacity building, some members were also wondering whether this trend could be reversed or checked. Questions were raised regarding the full utilization of existing or additional sources. Some speakers expressed concern over the modest ILO share in overall UNDP resources in the recent past and asked whether a closer dialogue with the management of UNDP might not lead to increasing UNDP financing for ILO activities. In reply to this question, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that, as had been mentioned by the representative of UNDP, decisions on the use of UNDP resources were made mainly at the country level through consultation between UNDP and the government concerned. The Government member of Cameroon and the Employer member of Lebanon asked whether the UNDP's emphasis on policy formulation and advice would not deprive developing countries of access to agencies' accumulated experience through project implementation. In reviewing the relationship between the ILO and financial institutions, speakers highlighted a twofold objective. Firstly, they stressed the need to forge a coherent policy and strategy with respect to poverty alleviation and the fight against unemployment, the acceptance of which will hopefully result in strengthening the social content of adjustment programmes. Secondly, they hoped that such high-level dialogue would have a positive impact on the financial flows available to the Organization. The Government member of the United States recalled, in this connection, that the World Bank itself had now come to realize that sound macroeconomic policies are necessary but not sufficient conditions for social progress. The Office was therefore urged to keep this matter under constant review; some members stressed the need for the new restructured Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body to monitor progress achieved in this regard on a continuing basis. Members of the Committee observed that in the current transitory phase, multi-bilaterally funded programmes had a special mission to fulfill, both in terms of providing continued financial support to the overall ILO technical cooperation programme and in focusing the funding on issues central to the ILO's mandate and its tripartite constituency. Mention was made by the two Vice-Chairmen and several other speakers of the international targets of attaining 0.7 per cent, and eventually 1 per cent of GNP for development purposes. However, some members recalled that, considering the prevailing economic hardships which industrialized countries themselves were presently facing, it was evident that some setback in terms of resource flows from North to South could be expected.

58. Members from the multi-bilateral community, and particularly countries sponsoring the Nordic United Nations project, expressed satisfaction over the timely and comprehensive reforms undertaken by the ILO which were in line with recommendations contained therein. This could, in future, translate into a strengthened partnership with the ILO. Mention was specifically made of a novel programming method applied in the ILO-Danida multi-bilateral cooperation, consisting of a four-year rolling financial plan for activities in five major technical fields. The Government member of the United Kingdom sought assurance from the Office that the provision of multi-bilateral resources was in harmony with multilateral principles and without conditionality. An assurance to this effect was given by the representative of the Secretary-General.

59. On several occasions members touched upon the future use and volume of the ILO's RBTC resources. They felt that at least during this period of financial uncertainties, RBTC credits might be used beyond their initial and established criteria which nevertheless remained valid: providing seed-money, support to social programmes central to the ILO's mandate, such as international labour standards. The possibility of increasing the volume of RBTC resources was raised. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that decisions concerning the level of RBTC resources were of the Governing Body's competence.

60. In reviewing the financial prospects for the programme, the Employers' group supported by other speakers, touched upon the possibility of securing domestic resources in countries and in specific situations where circumstances permitted. In this regard, a member proposed the use of training institutions applying the levy-grant system, national social security organizations capable of independently funding their own technical assistance needs, recourse to a user-pay system were given as examples. The Employers' Vice-Chairman submitted that in search of more cost-effective means, consideration be given to utilizing the services of experienced national retired professionals. The Government member of Sweden felt that on the strength of innovative and imaginative research proposals, donors might be willing to make the necessary resources available.

(b) Implementing and monitoring the programme

61. Members of the Committee from all three groups drew the Office's attention to the importance of setting in motion an implementation and monitoring system that would enable the Organization to continue to provide high-level technical services to ILO constituents. The Government member of Botswana suggested that the ILO should assist in the creation of "a critical mass" of local expertise in fields of its mandate.

62. One major concern was that careful monitoring and evaluation of the implementation process, jointly with constituents, should be an important feature of the ILO programme and that the universality of the Organization and its comparative advantage be safeguarded. There were some concerns expressed regarding the fact that with the 14 multidisciplinary teams addressing specific subregions, the voice of the region as a whole might not be heard with sufficient clarity.

63. The Government member of Australia advised that an appropriate reporting system, using rigorous performance indicators, be established to facilitate proper accountability and transparency, and that constant scrutiny during the implementation process be ensured. Some members felt that, notwithstanding the emerging emphasis on policy advice, the ILO would, at least for the near future, be engaged in administering and managing a wide range of operational activities. Several members commented on the notion of multidisciplinarity and urged the Office not to confine its application to the field-based teams but to make it an integral part of ILO's overall technical cooperation programme including technical services at headquarters, thus working towards effective integration of the various disciplines at all levels. In this connection, the representative of the Secretary-General cited a recent ILO Statement of Guiding Principles for ILO Field Activities on Structural Adjustment, in which a multidisciplinary approach was duly emphasized.

(c) Evaluation, lessons learned and feedback

64. Speakers from all three groups stressed that evaluation was essential for maintaining quality in the performance of the technical cooperation programme. Several speakers expressed the wish for more analytical evidence of sustainable results and difficulties encountered. The Government member of the United Kingdom inquired whether the benefits of the operational activities actually reached the intended target group. Several speakers proposed the introduction of comprehensive and systematic evaluation techniques. Some members felt that there was a lack of balance in the report concerning its treatment of resources, inputs and activities on the one hand, and results and impact on the other. The latter aspect should have received greater attention. External independent evaluation was cited as one useful method for enhancing the quality of the ILO's operational activities. The Government member of Argentina highlighted the need to take careful account of the cultural background and the social and economic circumstances prevailing in the country before determining the type of personnel inputs and other modalities. He further stressed the need for operational activities to be fully integrated into the national framework, since this was a prime condition for sustainability.

65. Members from both the Employers' and Workers' groups felt that the social partners were not associated to a sufficient degree with the review and evaluation of ILO activities, and noted that only if they were involved in the design and implementation could they be expected to contribute to evaluation. In this regard, the ILO had a role and responsibility, and the group expected that in the elaboration of country objectives, under the new active partnership policy, more ample opportunities would be given to the social partners.

66. Responding to a number of queries regarding the ILO's approach to review and evaluation, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled the principal means currently in use, including the review function performed by the Committee on Operational Programmes of the Governing Body. He added that at project level, the main elements were an initial plan of work, a progress report, tripartite review, self-evaluation and final evaluation. He considered that the existing system did not allocate resources for ex-post impact evaluation as its emphasis was on the review and evaluation of individual projects. In the context of the emerging active partnership policy, the ILO intended to introduce new computer-assisted monitoring, reporting and evaluation procedures in which a combination of external and self-evaluation would be an important component.

67. The Committee discussed the periodicity of future conference debates on the technical cooperation programme of the ILO; the proposals made by various speakers ranged from intervals of one year to five years or more. The Worker Vice-Chairman argued that his group was not in favour of too frequent reviews in view of the need to allow an adequate timeframe giving the Organization sufficient time to show measurable results of the Active Partnership Policy. In the meantime, the new Technical Cooperation Committee of the Governing Body would, at any rate, be monitoring the programme performance on an annual basis.

(d) Coordination

68. In their interventions speakers identified four interrelated levels at which the ILO needed to consider coordination: within the United Nations development system, in relation to other international development institutions, at the country-level and, finally, within its own operations and structure. Speakers underlined that, given the tight financial environment, coordination was more than ever of vital importance.

69. The ILO's efforts in harmonizing and coordinating operational activities in the context of the reforms under way within the United Nations system were generally appreciated. The direction of the strategic response outlined in the Office report was considered by most speakers as timely, compatible and in line with the thrust of General Assembly resolutions 44/211 of 1989 and 47/199 of 1992. (See also Active partnership policy chapter.)

70. Speakers from the Employers' and Workers' groups insisted on appropriate consultation mechanisms with the social partners, a matter that went beyond the issue of coordination only. Some recalled that since the technical cooperation programme was largely funded from extra-budgetary sources and to a large extent from multi-bilateral donors, the involvement of the constituents in coordination assumed greater significance. Coordination at the country level was particularly essential where the technical cooperation programme involved a number of counterpart organizations, as well as the social partners. It was stressed that the process of coordination should also serve to acquaint the diverse United Nations partners, including the Bretton Woods institutions, about the specificity of the ILO's mandate and fields of competence. Conversely, the ILO also had to take full cognizance of social programmes undertaken by other relevant organizations including bilateral aid agencies. For the attainment of certain strategic goals such as democratization, protection of human rights and humanitarian assistance, a tactical approach derived from a clear strategy based on coordination with concerned partners was vital.

71. Another salient issue was that of coordination in the context of national execution. The Organization had to ensure that the involvement of new development agents did not result in the weakening of its commitment to the tripartite mandate of the ILO. All opportunities should be sought to disseminate knowledge about tripartism and social dialogue amongst other United Nations agencies involved in promotion of social programmes.

72. The Committee was informed by the representative of the UNDP of some new initiatives designed to enhance the promotion, implementation and evaluation of UNDP-sponsored activities. Attention was drawn, in particular, to the introduction of the Country Strategy Note as the broad framework for country programmes and serving, thereby, as a useful reference to the entire UN system. Additionally, mention was made of a Programme Support Document introduced on a trial basis, also designed to improve internal coordination of United Nations inputs. Finally, he commended the International Training Centre in Turin for carrying out a series of workshops entitled Programme on Management of Field Coordination for Senior UN System Representatives.

Active partnership at work

73. A large number of speakers from the three groups welcomed the active partnership policy as an appropriate and timely strategic response to new challenges and constraints in the framework of the ongoing reform of the operational activities of the United Nations system. This policy consisted of both a new management structure and a new paradigm, featuring new substantive operational priorities and new modalities for the promotion and delivery of technical services to the ILO's constituents. Some speakers, including the Government members of Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway, the United States and Botswana, commended the Office for its wide-ranging initiative in adapting to the changing environment of international development cooperation.

74. Several speakers made specific references to parallels between the major elements in the new policies for the United Nations development system derived from the General Assembly resolutions 44/211 and 47/199, and those of the proposed strategic response of the ILO. These should enable the Office to contribute effectively to an integrated United Nations system-wide response to national objectives and priorities. The Workers' member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the group, noted with appreciation that the Office had responded constructively to the main recommendations emerging from the Nordic UN project, reference to which had been made in the Director-General's Report. These recommendations coincided with the concerns of his group, in particular as regards the strengthening of standard-setting activities, improving the analytical and technical capacity of the Office, redressing an imbalance between regular budget and extra-budgetary resources, and concentrating on activities within the core mandate and the comparative advantage of the ILO. His group equally endorsed the response of the Office to the new modalities emerging from the General Assembly resolutions and initiatives of UNDP, i.e. the focus on a programme approach and capacity building on the promotion of national execution modalities, and on the centering of UN development system assistance within the framework of a common country strategy.

75. While welcoming the general thrust of the proposed measures in the active partnership policy, several members addressed a number of specific issues and raised questions relating to its financial implications and to the management of the transitional period. The Government members of Sweden and Switzerland considered that there was also a risk involved in dismantling certain elements of the current structure which had proven effective, in order to establish the MDTs within the constraints of zero-growth. It was suggested that it would have been preferable to adopt a pilot approach by establishing a few MDTs initially, followed by a full implementation phase with the necessary adjustments made on the basis of experience gained. At any rate, the transition period and the early stages of implementation of the new structure should be closely monitored and corrective measures taken, as appropriate. Concern was also expressed by several speakers about the possible weakening of the unique technical experience of the ILO in a number of specific fields, for example in labour-intensive approaches to employment promotion and in informal sector activities. According to these speakers, the ILO should be careful not to lose ground in areas where its technical competence was universally recognized and where its assistance was needed. It was important to ensure the establishment of appropriate feedback mechanisms and operational exchanges between the MDTs and the technical departments, so as to maintain and continuously update the institutional knowledge base and the unity of policies of the ILO.

76. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and several members of both the Employers' and Workers' groups highlighted the pursuit of a continuous dialogue with the ILO's tripartite constituents in the setting of objectives at the country level as a major innovative feature in the new approach to technical cooperation. These objectives should be clearly structured and accompanied by performance indicators to enable monitoring and measurement of progress in the attainment of the objectives within a given timeframe. At the same time, as stressed by some speakers, the objectives would need to be regularly reviewed and adjusted to the changing requirements and needs of the constituents, and flexibility in the approach to the achievement of objectives was called for. However, the concept of country objectives should not be taken to imply that the Office should no longer be able to assist each of the three constituents individually, and directly at their request. The Employer member from Kenya, supported by other members, stressed the need for an approach that embodied the principles of an active and also equal partnership between the ILO and its three constituents.

77. It was generally recognized that, beyond the setting of objectives for collaboration between the ILO and the three constituents at the country, regional and global levels of the ILO programme, the concept of active partnership extended to the active participation of the constituents in the identification, preparation, implementation and evaluation of technical cooperation activities. These activities should focus on strengthening the capacities of the constituents through training and joint implementation, and should make full use of, and interact with their own expertise.

78. Several Government members stressed that the concept of active partnership should extend also to the ILO's development partners in and outside the United Nations system, including the NGOs, in the context of a coherent and integrated UN system response to national priorities and the country strategy. The active partnership with donors, both multilateral organizations and bilateral donor countries, should be geared towards orienting their policies and programmes to social concerns, identifying common ground for coordinated action or collaboration and to the mobilizing of resources for ILO technical cooperation.

79. The Vice-Chairmen of the Employers' and Workers' groups, and a number of Government members, addressed management issues associated with the establishment of the MDTs. One set of issues concerned the functioning of the MDTs in relation to the other components of the ILO structure. The need for clear lines of reporting, control and communications with clearly delineated roles and responsibilities of headquarters, regional offices, field offices and MDTs was stressed by the Government member of Japan as well as by other members. To become an effective tool for providing services to ILO constitutents in technical cooperation, there should be a real decentralization of authority to the field structure, under the overall policy guidance of headquarters. At the same time, it was recalled that the MDTs could not cover all fields of ILO competence. Therefore, they should function as catalysts for the mobilization of technical expertise wherever located in the ILO structure. Several speakers expressed concern that the introduction of the MDTs might add an additional layer to the hierarchy, and stressed the need to simplify bureaucratic procedures and to concentrate on practical achievements.

80. Another set of issues commented on by many speakers concerned management of and within the MDTs. The Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group emphasized that the directors of MDTs should be selected based on proven leadership qualities and technical competence, which were seen as the key to success. In addition, the management of the MDTs should be based on structured objectives and clear work plans, which would facilitate monitoring, reporting and evaluation of their performance. Many members were of the view that the MDTs would need active support in many respects from headquarters, especially in the initial phase, and that training of their staff geared to team-building was important to ensure an effective integration of and interaction between the various technical disciplines represented in the teams.

81. A number of questions were raised about the composition, location and functioning of multidisciplinary teams which, it was generally felt, should be flexible and subject to review and change after experience had been gained. Stress was laid upon the importance of having officials in each team who would provide support to employers' and workers' organizations. The MDTs should also utilize the capacity and expertise available in these organizations as well as other sources of local expertise, thereby contributing to the further development of national capacity. In addition, the teams should include specialists in international labour standards to facilitate the integration of standards in all aspects of their work. It was noted with concern that in some technical fields, in particular those related to employment and economic development, the MDTs would have less decentralized technical competence than before, and the example of the regional employment teams was cited in this regard.

82. There was a general consensus that the complexity of problems with which the ILO and its constituents were faced, particularly in the context of the transition to market economies, structural adjustment and the persistent deterioration of the economic performance of many LDCs, required a more integrated, multidisciplinary approach as proposed by the Office. The need for a multidisciplinary approach extended, by definition, to the ILO's relations with other specialized technical agencies. Inter-agency collaboration would be required to tackle many development problems in a comprehensive and effective manner. While endorsing the need for multidisciplinarity, some members felt that this would not emerge simply by putting together specialists representing different disciplines in a team. The Government members of Sweden and the United States underlined the need for the Office to develop a more systematic methodology and evolve practical guidelines for the integration of and interaction between the various disciplines within the ILO's technical competence. Multidisciplinarity in advisory services and technical cooperation activities in the field would need to be matched and supported by the same approach in the work of the technical departments at headquarters and in all other activities of the Organization.

Consideration and adoption of the draft Resolution and Conclusions prepared by the Working Party

83. At the ninth sitting of the Committee, the Chairman introduced the draft Resolution and Conclusions prepared by the Working Party, and proposed that they be considered point by point. It was so agreed.

84. The Committee had before it 82 proposed amendments to the text prepared by the Working Party. The Workers' group pointed out that they had been able to limit the number of amendments submitted after agreement had been reached in the Working Party on a number of points. A number of amendments which merely sought to introduce improvements in the text or to stress a particular point were adopted by consensus, while some others were rejected or withdrawn after a brief discussion due to lack of support or because changes they sought to introduce had been covered by amendments adopted previously. Decisions were reached in a number of cases by taking a formal vote, mostly resorting to a simplified method of voting proposed by the Government member of Sweden, and agreed upon by the Committee, which enabled the Committee to ascertain whether proposed amendments or subamendments stood a reasonable chance of being carried.

85. The following points of the report summarize the discussion on major issues. A number of amendments were proposed by all three groups on point 7 dealing with the substantive priorities for ILO technical cooperation in the 1990s. The Employers' group strongly felt that the importance of employment creation, which had been mentioned also by a number of governments in the prevailing global economic environment, should be fully reflected among the priorities by adding the words "and employment creation" to "poverty alleviation". The Employers' group stressed that the term poverty alleviation did not include all the aspects of employment promotion and that some employment issues went beyond the alleviation of poverty. The Employers' concerns were supported by some Government members who sought to include them in a number of proposed subamendments. The Government member of Mexico, speaking in support of an amendment proposed by the Government member of Malaysia concerning a higher priority for human resources development, which was not adopted, wished to go on record to state that this was indeed a major concern to developing countries. The Workers' members and a majority of governments felt, however, that employment creation should not be added as a fourth priority as this would detract from the key importance they attached to the three priorities. A subamendment proposed by the Government delegate of Denmark, which put the priorities in the order in which they were presented in the introduction to the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95 and which included employment creation as a means towards poverty alleviation, was eventually carried after a vote.

86. Several amendments to the summary of substantive priority areas in the clauses of point 7 were introduced to reflect particular concerns of the three groups and some of these were adopted, thus introducing major changes, through subamendments, that went some way towards accommodating concerns expressed by the Employers' group and which were shared by some Government members. The extension of social security was qualified by including in clause 7(d) the words "wherever possible" as this was considered more realistic at a time when the economic viability of many existing social security schemes was threatened. The importance attached by the Employers and several Government members to training in entrepreneurship and small enterprise development was also brought out more clearly in the amended clause 7(c). The Employers' group regretted that the Workers' group could not accept their proposal to include a reference to improving labour productivity as a priority area.

87. Clarifications were sought, and subsequently provided by some Worker members, on the definition, operationalization, and implications of the conclusions relating to gender issues, as reflected in points 8 and 35. Amendments introduced to modify these points by stressing the overall objective of promoting equality of opportunity were not adopted. The Workers' members stated that they felt these amendments would significantly weaken the text. The addition of a clear statement of purpose, proposed by the United States Government member and to be included as the opening sentence of point 8, was adopted by consensus. The spokesman of the Employers' group, which had sponsored the amendments, then expressed significant reservations about the text. He reiterated his group's commitment to the promotion of equality of opportunity. It remained unclear, however, how the goal of achieving equality of opportunity and treatment could best be reached in practice. In his view the draft text seemed to focus on measures that favoured a certain rigidity which would in fact be less effective and perhaps counterproductive, compared with a more constructive and positive approach. The Employers' group asked that the record show that the Workers' group opposed their amendment concerning full respect for the principle of equality of opportunity.

88. A number of amendments were introduced on points 10, 14, 15, 16 and 17 concerning the relationship between international labour standards and technical cooperation, by the Employers' group and the Government member of the United States. The Employers' group, recapitulating views and arguments put forward in greater detail in a large number of interventions by members of their group during the plenary debate, stated their commitment to the basic human rights standards, but not to all standards some of which were unrealistic and could aggravate the unemployment situation, and reiterated their firm opposition to any notion of subordination and conditionality. They stressed that their views were supported by several Government members, particularly from developing countries. When pressed to the vote, and faced with the determination of the Workers' group to retain the draft text, the Employers' amendments to points 14, 15, 16 and 17 were not carried. During the discussion of these amendments, the Employers' group emphasized that they held strong views on this section of the report and that if their concerns were not met, they would have to seriously consider whether they could support the Conclusions.

89. A discussion took place on several issues relating to the section of the conclusions (points 18-22) on tripartism and social dialogue when dealing with a number of amendments seeking to improve the text, some of which were adopted. In relation to the use of the term "participation", the Employers' group would have had preference for the consistent use of the term "close consultation" throughout the text thus allowing for more flexibility and avoiding any difficulties which might arise, in respect of programmes of assistance to employers' and workers' organizations. As regards the point dealing with the concept of partnership with donors (point 28), the Workers' group sought to delete a reference to resources, in addition to expertise, being made available by employers' and workers' organizations for ILO technical cooperation activities, through an amendment which was not adopted. The Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group then stated formally that his group had reservations about the text so adopted.

90. In view of the anticipated decline in resources and the need for the ILO to remain within its mandate, and to make use of its comparative advantage which nevertheless included many priority issues as indicated in these conclusions, it was decided to add a new point to introduce the section on key management issues, stating that the ILO should further develop a coherent strategy for technical cooperation, to be presented to the Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body as soon as possible. The Governing Body should also, according to an amendment to point 24 which was adopted, closely monitor the impact of the expected reduction in UNDP resources on the technical cooperation programme.

91. At the conclusion of the sitting, which had been extended to allow the Committee to complete its consideration of the draft Resolution and Conclusions, the Chairman conveyed to the members his appreciation for their constructive contributions to the debate on the text prepared by the Working Party. In his view, a useful document had been produced. Looking back at the discussion, the spokesman for the Employers' group expressed the regret of his group that their most important concerns had not been taken into account in spite of support from a number of governments. These concerns are related to some fundamental issues facing the Organization, which his group would pursue further. His group would carefully examine the Conclusions in the light of the results, to determine whether they could be supported.

92. The Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group felt that the Committee had completed its substantive task satisfactorily, and congratulated members on the useful contributions made.

Adoption of the report

93. At its 11th and final sitting, the Committee met to conclude its business. The Chairman, recalling the discussion by the Committee of the draft resolution and conclusions, which had been examined and adopted at its tenth session, invited the members to approve the draft report. Some Government members proposed minor amendments to sections of the report referring to points they had raised during the debate for the Committee.

94. The Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, in his concluding remarks, made the following statement, which he requested be included in full in the report:

> We have come to this Committee with full enthusiasm for technical cooperation, thinking that concentration on discussing and reporting will be on how to realize technical cooperation and how to finance and manage it in the best possible way for the recipient countries who suffer from unemployment and underemployment and low technical level of human resources. We remain committed to that agenda. Unfortunately, we found out that the discussion was gradually gliding into fields which were not exactly in conformity with issues central to technical cooperation, especially so since standard setting and research came as issues. This does not mean that we do not see several positive points as point 7, especially clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the objectives on training, employment, democratization, tripartism and assistance to employers' and workers' organizations. We do, however, have serious concern regarding the chapter entitled Synergy between technical labour standards and technical cooperation. In our judgement, it does not reflect the point of view which we expressed in the Committee, nor is it in conformity with the deliberations of the Governing Body on this subject because of ignoring our point of view and misinterpreting the Governing Body document. We find ourselves in opposition to this chapter. In doing so, we are thinking of the real needs of recipient countries which are made more difficult to realize because of the artificial relationship injected in this chapter between technical cooperation and ILO standards. Other concerns which are justified are not being spelled out here but we reserve this right to make our position known at the plenary of the Conference.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman concluded by expressing the appreciation of his group for the contributions to the work of the Committee made by the Chairman, the Reporter, the secretariat and the interpreters.

95. In his concluding remarks, the Workers' Vice Chairman stated that his group was happy to endorse the report and the draft resolution and conclusions. In his view, the report and draft conclusions reflected, in a balanced manner, the views expressed by all three groups during the debate. The Committee's work had been exemplary in terms of active tripartism. While his group would also have wished more prominence given to their concerns, it was inevitable and a strength of tripartism, that the result reflected a compromise between the different views. The Committee should be satisfied with the results of its work which would provide useful guidance for the Governing Body, through its Committee on Technical Cooperation, for evaluating the ILO's technical cooperation programme over the next half decade. He also expressed his appreciation for the contribution of the other groups and thanked the Chairman, the Reporter, the secretariat and the interpreters for their indefatigable efforts.

96. The report of the Committee as well as the resolution and the conclusions, as adopted by the Committee, are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Adopts the following conclusions and invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to give due consideration to them in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of the technical cooperation programme.

CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE ROLE OF THE ILO IN TECHNICAL COOPERATION

Introduction

1. Technical cooperation should remain a major means of action for the attainment of the objectives of the ILO, complementing other means of action, in accordance with its mandate defined in the Constitution, and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

2. Technical cooperation should be implemented in accordance with the objectives of the ILO and the needs and priorities of the recipient countries and should be confined to the fields central to the ILO's competence, making full use of its comparative advantage and tripartite structure. The programme should furthermore focus on the strengthening of national capacities of developing countries in the fields of ILO competence to help them attain the goal of self-reliance.

3. Priorities for country-specific ILO technical cooperation activities should be identified at the country-level by relevant government agencies in close consultations with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations and the Office and other donors responsible for substantial programmes of technical cooperation in the country, as appropriate.

4. In view of the increasingly competitive development environment in which the Organization has to operate, every possible measure should be taken to strengthen its unique expertise obtained from its tripartite structure. This is to be achieved through the allocation of resources to the agreed priorities through the programme and budget process and the adoption of appropriate personnel policies supported by a need-based training programme which includes promotion of understanding of the concerns of the social partners.

5. ILO technical cooperation should be an integral part of the operational activities for development, and as such should be carried out in full coordination with the various programmes and agencies in the UN system in order to avoid unnecessary overlap and duplication, and bearing in mind the ILO's own distinct objectives and tripartite structure. Particular attention should be given to General Assembly resolutions 44/211 and 47/199, previously cited.

6. The Governing Body should intensify its efforts to monitor, review and evaluate the technical cooperation programme, particularly through its new Committee on Technical Cooperation. This process should include evaluation of the overall programme and specific findings with respect to key programme areas. Programme evaluation should be based on rigourous methodology approved by the Governing Body through its appropriate committee. It would be desirable for the International Labour Conference to undertake a comprehensive review of the programme at regular intervals, at least every five years.

Objectives and priorities

(a) Substantive priorities

7. In the 1990s the ILO technical cooperation programme should focus on three major areas, namely, support for democratization, poverty alleviation which, inter alia, includes employment creation, and the protection of workers. They can be summarized as follows:

(a) The promotion of democratic and representative institutions based on a sound and equitable legal framework, consistent with the relevant international labour standards, should be in the forefront of ILO concerns.

(b) Full, productive and freely chosen employment is the most effective means of fighting poverty. Future technical cooperation activities should aim especially at helping ILO constituents to contribute to the formulation of economic policies which increase employment, ensure sustainable development and promote economic growth.

(c) Human resources development and training for employment continue to be priority concerns. ILO assistance should increasingly concentrate on strengthening national capacity to formulate a training policy closely linked to labour market analysis as well as on encouraging private-sector training, including training in entrepreneurship and enterprise development and promoting greater flexibility in public training systems. In this regard account should be taken of the Conclusions appended to the Resolution concerning adjustment and human resources development, adopted by the Conference at its 79th (1992) Session.

(d) In the field of social protection, particular attention should be paid to the development, reform, and wherever possible the extension of social security schemes, health care and social safety nets. Greater emphasis should be placed on improving working conditions, in particular for workers in hazardous occupations.

(e) Special attention should be given to the most vulnerable groups, emphasizing support for the development of employers' and workers' organizations, to enable their effective participation in the process of development.

(f) The elimination of child labour should be pursued through a comprehensive approach based on the relevant ILO standards, tripartism, multidisciplinarity, and gender specificity. The abolition of forced labour and the protection of migrant workers and disadvantaged groups should be pursued vigorously.

(g) ILO assistance for the development of all major components of national labour administration systems, inter alia, by tripartite labour inspection evaluation missions should continue to be made available.

8. The promotion of gender equality in all development activities should be a basic concern of the ILO's technical cooperation programme. The application of gender-specific performance indicators should be integrated throughout the ILO's technical cooperation programme. It is essential, taking previous experiences into account, to ensure the full participation of women in the planning, design, implementation and evaluation of ILO development programmes and projects and to incorporate gender-specific criteria at all stages of the programme and project cycles. In the implementation of the programmes, particular attention should be paid to the ILO plan of action on equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment, the resolution concerning ILO action for women workers adopted at the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference and the series of ILO Conventions and Recommendations designed to combat discrimination based on gender.

(b) Major modalities

9. In order to make the most effective use of the limited resources at its disposal the ILO should focus its technical cooperation programme on a selected number of priorities central to its mandate in accordance with the specific needs of the constituents in the recipient countries and thus ensuring that the Organization does fewer things better.

10. ILO technical cooperation should help the member States to achieve progress towards the ratification of ILO conventions and towards better application of international labour standards.

11. A renewed effort should be made to promote tripartism. Priority should be given to providing assistance to strengthen labour ministries and employers' and workers' organizations.

12. The ILO should do everything possible within its mandate to consolidate efforts geared to promoting viable and sustainable economic and social development of the least developed countries taking account of the programme of action adopted at the Second United Nations Conference on Least Developed Countries in 1990.

13. The ILO, in accordance with its mandate, should actively contribute to the implementation of Agenda 21 adopted in 1992 at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development. Particular attention should be paid to the relevant recommendations of the ILO Tripartite Advisory Meeting on Environment and the World of Work held in November 1992. Concern for environmental aspects and impact should be integrated in all technical cooperation. Operational guidelines should be prepared to ascertain that environmental concerns are integrated at all stages of the programme and project cycles.

Synergy between international labour standards and technical cooperation

14. Technical cooperation should not been seen as separate from other means of action, especially standard-setting and research. They should complement and reinforce each other in pursuing the ILO's objectives, thus contributing to development. ILO standards should thus be used as guiding principles for ILO technical cooperation activities.

15. Sensitization activities on the close complementarity between ILO standards and technical cooperation should be increasingly directed beyond the ILO and aim at funds, programmes and agencies in the United Nations system both at the central and country levels, multi-bilateral donors, international and regional financial institutions, in particular the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, ILO constituents, government officials and parliamentarians.

16. Within the ILO, the complementarity between ILO standard setting and technical cooperation needs to be implemented in order to promote economic and social progress through the ratification and effective application of international labour standards, in the spirit of positive and constructive responses to be given to the ILO's constituents, in accordance with the guidelines noted by the Governing Body at its 252nd Session (March 1992).

17. Greater use should be made of the ILO regular budget and other funds available for technical cooperation to promote such links between standards and technical cooperation.

Promotion of tripartism and social dialogue

18. In order to increase and sustain the democratization process in a growing number of countries, close consultations with employers' and workers' organizations on economic and social policy options are necessary. Given this trend, the ILO must be able to provide advisory services and training as requested, enabling these organizations to strengthen their capacity to collect and analyze information, effectively participate in social dialogue, and to assume their new responsibilities under national execution.

19. Every possible measure should be taken to ensure that the social partners participate in the planning, implementation and evaluation of various activities under the ILO technical cooperation programme. As appropriate, special efforts should be made to sensitize constituents to the concept and application of a tripartite approach.

20. Consultations with the UNDP should continue to strongly emphasize tripartite participation in UNDP-funded technical cooperation activities in the fields of ILO competence. In this regard, urgent and ongoing actions are required by both the ILO and the UNDP.

21. Multilateral and multi-bilateral donors should be encouraged to increase their contributions to programmes directly benefiting workers' and employers' organizations in the recipient countries.

22. Special efforts should be made by the Office to encourage member States to ratify and implement the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and apply the Tripartite Consultation (Activities of the International Labour Organization) Recommendation, 1976 (No. 152).

Key management issues

23. Given, on the one hand, the many priorities indicated in these Conclusions and, on the other, the anticipated decline in funding and the clearly expressed need for the ILO to remain within its mandate to make use of its comparative advantage and to do fewer things better, it is important to further develop a coherent ILO strategy for technical cooperation. Such a strategy should indicate clear priorities, feasible instruments for their attainment and a realistic timeframe. This will permit clear criteria for the monitoring of progress by the Governing Body and the Conference and also ensure optimal use of scarce technical cooperation resources to achieve maximum impact. Accordingly, such a strategy document should be presented to the Technical Cooperation Committee of the Governing Body as soon as possible, taking due account of the following key management issues.

(a) Funding

24. The ILO should continue to make every effort to ensure a steady and sufficient flow of resources for its programme, bearing in mind changing priorities and approaches. Consideration should be given to the best use of the UNDP Technical Support Services at the Programme Level (TSS1) facility both as a catalyst and a complement to research and policy advisory work under the ILO's regular budget. An appropriate amount of funds should be earmarked for RBTC which should continue to play a key role in the ILO technical cooperation programme. Priority attention should be given to those ILO activities central to the core mandate which do not attract sufficient extra-budgetary funds.

25. As the application of the national execution/implementation modality progresses, the level of resources made available by UNDP for ILO execution/implementation is expected to decline. The impact of this resource decline on the technical cooperation programme should be kept under constant review by the Governing Body with regular reports being presented to it for consideration and appropriate action.

26. Efforts should be made to establish and intensify collaboration with new multi-bilateral donors and with the European Community, and generally to make the ILO's technical cooperation programme better understood and valued in donor and recipient countries alike. Special emphasis should be given to promoting the comparative advantage of the ILO as a channel for multilateral programmes, particularly with respect to its potential to ensure cohesion, complementarity, effective monitoring and evaluation mechanisms.

27. In contrast to stagnation and potential decline in official development aid flows, a greater amount of resources are being transferred to developing countries from international and regional financial institutions and, recently, through private sector flows. These trends are increasingly influencing economic and social development issues in developing countries. Taking these developments into account, the Office should strengthen its dialogue with the financial development institutions in close collaboration with the Organization's tripartite constituents and pursue an active involvement in all relevant aspects and at appropriate levels of their operations, in order to promote the full incorporation of social objectives in the policies and operations of these institutions and to secure funding from these institutions for the ILO's involvement in those elements of their programmes of technical cooperation in which the ILO can offer a comparative advantage.

28. The concept of partnership should be extended to donors financing the ILO's technical cooperation activities by (a) the continuance and expansion of member States seconding expertise at no cost to the ILO technical cooperation activities; (b) workers' and employers' organizations in developed countries making expertise and resources available for ILO programmes in respect of their counterparts in developing countries; and (c) fuller commitment to make expertise and resources available for technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC) and countries in transition.

(b) Coordination

29. As a part of the United Nations system, and with its long experience in training, the ILO should fully support and contribute to the renewed system-wide efforts to strengthen national capacities of recipient countries and to enhance the coherence and impact of the operational activities of the system as a whole at the country level taking into account national development objectives.

30. In the pursuance of the new modalities such as national execution, programme approach, and greater emphasis on policy and programme-level advisory services, it is important to take full account of the capacities and needs of the recipient countries. An effective ILO technical cooperation programme should be conceived and implemented at the country level as a blend of policy-oriented research, policy advisory services and the execution/ implementation of projects.

31. Care should be taken to ensure that the ILO's principles and concerns are fully reflected in an integrated UN response at the country level in accordance with the country objectives to be jointly identified with ILO tripartite constituents. Programmes must be coordinated carefully with other programmes delivered by the United Nations system. There must also be careful coordination with other multilateral and bilateral donor organizations involved in similar fields of technical cooperation within each recipient country.

32. The ILO should actively participate in the planned evaluation of the new UNDP support cost arrangements and keep the Governing Body fully informed of the outcome.

(c) Programme implementation and evaluation

33. There is a continuing need for enhancing the relevance, cost-effectiveness and impact of technical cooperation, consistent with General Assembly resolutions 44/211 and 47/199. In this regard renewed efforts should be made to strengthen the functions of planning, monitoring and evaluation of all ILO technical cooperation activities both at headquarters and in the field, irrespective of their source of financing, within the framework of the active partnership policy.

34. The ILO should gradually devolve project execution and implementation to the recipient countries themselves as and when they are prepared to assume such responsibility, while shifting focus to policy and programme level advisory services. In this process, the national capacity of the recipient country should be carefully assessed, in consultation with its social partners and with the funding agency as appropriate.

35. Particular attention should be given to monitoring the degree to which women are represented as beneficiaries within the ILO's technical cooperation work, both through programmes specifically directed towards them and through their participation in general programmes. This question should be the subject for ongoing consideration by the Governing Body Committee on Technical Cooperation to ensure that women are represented as fully as possible in all aspects of technical cooperation. ILO technical cooperation should be carried out in such a way as to promote the elimination of adverse discrimination.

36. Quality control of the design and formulation of technical cooperation programmes and projects should remain a major concern. However, good design is a necessary but not sufficient condition for the success of technical cooperation activities. Therefore, the ILO should pay closer attention, in cooperation with its partners, to developing adequate mechanisms for the identification and planning of programmes and projects at the country level and for the effective monitoring of their implementation.

37. Considerable experience has been gained from past technical cooperation activities, hence, there is a need for wide dissemination, both inside and outside the Organization, of lessons learned and for ensuring that these lessons are taken into account when planning and implementing future activities. The ILO's unique position as an integrator of tripartite perspectives and experience should be stressed.

38. The combination of self-evaluation and independent evaluations is considered a valid approach. Self-evaluation benefits from the technical knowledge and experience of those directly responsible for implementation, allows for increased accountability and facilitates feedback. Independent evaluations which utilize outside specialists from the relevant ILO constituents, add objectivity and credibility to the overall evaluation and serve to make technical cooperation activities more transparent and comparable.

39. The long-term impact and the sustainability of technical cooperation activities should be pursued more systematically by undertaking comprehensive ex-post evaluations. The results of such evaluations could then contribute to ensure a more effective use of future aid resources.

40. In order to effectively respond to constantly evolving needs of recipient countries, a careful examination has to be made to select and assign the most appropriate expertise, bearing in mind that there is a growing need for increased use of national and regional experts for short-term assignments as a means of strengthening local participation aimed at achieving cost-effectiveness and sustainability.

41. ILO activities for the procurement of equipment and the subcontracting of services should be carried out in support of its substantive technical cooperation operations, aiming at providing the most appropriate type and quality of equipment and services at the lowest possible cost in accordance with established competitive procedures including also advice to constituents on market trends and technology, seeking to increase procurement from developing and underutilized donor countries and training assistance.

42. The ILO International Training Centre in Turin should continue to act as a key training instrument covering, among others, project-related training complementary to the technical services provided by other ILO programmes. It should also contribute to the design and implementation of various training activities within the United Nations system with particular emphasis on the ILO's core mandate, and strengthening the management capacity of recipient governments and the social partners for technical cooperation and on fostering effective coordination and teamwork within the UN system itself. The Centre should also be fully utilized in various stages in the implementation of the active partnership policy.

43. In its efforts to promote technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC), the ILO should focus on providing technical advisory services through regional, subregional, interregional and global exchanges.

It should also encourage them to make greater effort to mobilize the necessary resources for self-reliance and equality.

Active partnership policy

44. An active and meaningful partnership between the ILO's constituents, on a tripartite basis, and the Office, in particular at the field level, should be established for the purpose of formulating technical cooperation programmes as part of an integrated programme covering all areas of action of the ILO for the benefit of member States.

45. The various elements of the active partnership policy including the formulation of country objectives and the deployment of multidisciplinary teams should be vigorously implemented and carefully monitored.

46. The proposed country objectives will provide a framework for the ILO's operations in a given country. In formulating objectives, full consultations should be undertaken with the tripartite constituents to ensure that their priorities and concerns are fully integrated in the objectives so identified. This would be without prejudice to the policy of the ILO to assist the social partners directly. The country objectives should contribute effectively to, and take account of national development plans and priorities and be coordinated with the country strategy supported by the international development partners. In drawing up the country objectives particular care should be taken to ensure that the authorities in the country concerned are fully committed to taking forward and where appropriate implementing the conclusions of any projects designed to offer advice on policy or planning.

47. The ILO should increasingly concentrate on the provision of policy advice and assistance for the development of local capacities for the planning, monitoring and evaluation of technical cooperation activities. In this connection the ILO needs to concentrate more on policy-oriented and evaluation research, and the results achieved through technical cooperation, in addition to methodological and conceptual research. ILO research and studies should increasingly be judged a success in terms of their relevance to policy application. Emphasis needs to be placed both on country-specific studies carried out at the regional level and on comparative research and analysis going beyond the geographical boundaries of MDTs, to be performed by headquarters.

48. The growing complexity of social and economic issues demands a multidisciplinary approach to the provision of policy advice and other technical services and the integration of specific disciplines in a practical approach to development needs. The ILO has already taken various measures to promote and apply a multidisciplinary approach including the implementation of interdepartmental projects, the establishment of multidisciplinary teams and conceptual work being undertaken. This effort should be continued and intensified. The ILO should develop its conceptual framework and specific analytical tools to enable the effective application of multidisciplinarity.

49. Under the authority of the regional director, ILO offices should have responsibility for the identification of needs, in close consultation with the tripartite constituency, and for the management of ILO activities in the countries or subregions they cover, with the technical support of the multidisciplinary teams, and with appropriate support and overall guidance from headquarters.

50. The multidisciplinary teams should have clearly defined and structured objectives, and work plans which would permit evaluation of progress within a given time-frame. To ensure their most effective functioning, special attention needs to be given to team composition, coordination and management as well as training. The location and the composition of the multidisciplinary teams should be kept under constant review by the Governing Body so that they may effectively respond to the changing needs of the countries and regions. Special attention should be given by the Governing Body to ensuring that MDTs do include skills required to deal with particular issues such as child labour, social security issues and the transition to market economies.

51. The MDTs should be actively supported by the technical departments, interacting with headquarters staff, other MDTs and other organizations within the United Nations system. As a consequence of the tripartite structure of the ILO, the employers' and workers' specialists within each MDT should, while working closely with other members of the team, report to their respective headquarters' bureau. Maximum collaboration with and use of local expertise and institutions should be promoted and periodically monitored by the Governing Body Committee on Technical Cooperation.

52. The progress in the implementation of the active partnership policy should be periodically reported to the Governing Body and included in overall evaluation of achievements and impact by the International Labour Conference, at least every five years.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 213 members (109 Government members, 22 Employers' members and 81 Workers' members). It also included 33 Government deputy members, 14 Employers' deputy members and 68 Workers' deputy members. In addition, one Government was represented by an observer.[1]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. S. Pérez del Castillo (Government member, Uruguay);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Germany); and Mr. W. Peirens (Workers' member, Belgium);

Reporter: Ms. K. Wiklund (Government member, Sweden).

3. The Committee held 19 sittings.

4. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following: (i) information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference; (ii) reports supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions; and (iii) reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981.[2]

5. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general aspects of the application of Conventions (particularly ratified Conventions) and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution. It then discussed the General Survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, on workers with family responsibilities. Finally, it considered various individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities. The examination of those cases, which is the essential work of the Committee, was based principally on the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and on the oral and written explanations provided by the governments concerned. The Committee also referred to its discussions in previous years, comments received from employers' or workers' organizations and, where appropriate, the reports of other ILO supervisory bodies. In view of the short time available, the Committee followed its usual practice of making a selection among the Committee of Experts' observations and consequently discussed a limited number of cases. The necessity of making this selection in no way affects the conclusion of the Committee of Experts in other cases that, in view of the problems encountered, it would be appropriate to ask the governments concerned to supply information to the present session of the Conference. The Committee trusts that those governments will pay close attention to the requests of the Committee of Experts. A summary of the information supplied by governments, the discussions in the present Committee and any conclusions it has drawn is set out in Part Two of this report.

6. The Committee decided to maintain its usual practice of adopting formal minutes of its general discussion as well as the discussions of individual cases. Those minutes constitute a detailed record of the views of members of the Committee which it is not the purpose of this report to duplicate.

7. The Committee was very pleased to welcome as an observer during the general discussion the Chairman of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Dr. J. M. Ruda. This was the first time ever that the Committee of Experts had had the opportunity to be formally represented in the Conference Committee, and it marked a new stage in the intensification of the dialogue and cooperation between these two essential parts of the ILO's supervisory system. The Committee again expresses its wish that the Director-General should invite the Chairman of the Committee of Experts to be present as an observer at its general discussion next year.

8. Dr. Ruda, on behalf of the Committee of Experts, expressed his gratitude for the invitation to be present in the Committee's general discussion. He was impressed by the emphasis placed in the Committee on dialogue, showing belief in the power of persuasion as a means of achieving results: it seemed that the differences of opinion led to a search for consensus rather than confrontation. The present Committee, like the Committee of Experts, took time to reflect on how difficulties in conscientiously applying international labour standards might be resolved. Mr. Ruda was impressed too by the amicable atmosphere in which the Committee's deliberations took place: unpoliticized discussion in this way facilitated an objective appreciation of the Committee of Experts' own observations. Criticisms – which he had found to be constructive – would be transmitted to his colleagues. The Committee of Experts was an old and experienced organ of the ILO, which endeavoured to improve and adapt to change, while preserving intact its independence, objectivity and impartiality. Mr. Ruda recalled that the ILO supervisory system, of which the Committee of Experts is part, with its aim of achieving the due and complete implementation of international labour standards, remains the most effective in any international organization. The real conditions in which legislation is applied are always more complex than and cannot be fully anticipated by the legal standard itself. The present Committee and the Committee of Experts must each accomplish their complementary missions, in aid of the ILO's ultimate goal: social justice.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

I. Supervisory system

(i) Roles of the supervisory bodies

9. The Committee noted with satisfaction the Committee of Experts' positive response to the invitation to be represented during the present Committee's general discussion. The relationship between the two bodies continues to strengthen on a well-established basis: the Committee of Experts' high-quality report is prepared on the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality and is an essential starting-point for the work of the present Committee. The Committee believes that the effectiveness of the supervisory system depends on constructive dialogue between the two bodies.

10. The Employers' member of the United States recalled that the Committee of Experts had originally been set up to advise the present Committee as to the facts, since the Conference Committee was otherwise unable to complete its work in the time available. The Committee of Experts' role was to provide assistance to the Conference Committee by determining whether there was compliance with ratified Conventions, so that this Committee and the Conference could ultimately decide on their own attitude and what action they might take or recommend. He stressed the importance of cooperation between the two Committees, which each made different contributions, in particular, to the interpretation of Conventions. It was essential to the credibility of the supervisory system that the Committee of Experts should take account of the discussions held in the present Committee and respond to the questions raised, particularly in cases. The success of the supervisory system was a remarkable achievement and attempts to improve it were intended to be constructive.

11. The Workers' members emphasized the complementarity of the two bodies, and the indispensable demarcation of the functions and attributions of the two Committees. In its composition and working methods, the Committee of Experts guarantees the objective and impartial evaluation of the national situation with regard to standards. The Conference Committee gives the supervisory system vitality because of its experience and the evidence brought by employers' and workers' organizations. The Workers' members considered that respect for the respective functions and composition of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee are indispensable in guaranteeing the overall effectiveness of the supervisory system. The Workers' members welcomed the fact that the Committee of Experts in its choice of cases and subjects takes account of practical concerns and priorities. In this spirit, the Committee of Experts gives special attention to the observance of standards in export zones and cases which have provoked detailed discussion at the Conference. However, the Workers' member of the Netherlands considered there was sometimes a lack of continuity and responsiveness on the part of the Committee of Experts in certain cases where it has failed to formulate observations which the Workers' group would have wished to discuss in the Committee. During the Cold War, when the supervisory machinery had been under attack by the Soviet Union, the Workers' and Employers' groups in the Conference Committee had been united in wholeheartedly supporting the Committee of Experts, and the Conference Committee's concerted action had thus averted the threat to the supervisory system. However, by the end of the 1980s, the Employers in particular had begun to question the validity of certain conclusions of the Committee of Experts: this had led in turn to the Committee of Experts explaining their position as regards the question of interpretation in paragraphs 6 and 7 of their 1990 report, and now the Employers and Workers found themselves expressing opposite points of view. This jeopardized the integrity of the supervisory system far more than the Soviet threat and could lead to a breakdown of the normal functioning of the Conference Committee: time was uselessly consumed by the question of the Committee of Experts' authority in relation particularly to the question of interpretation of the right to strike, and there was a real danger that the Employers' arguments would precipitate further contentions by governments seeking a way out of their difficulties. The Workers' members observed that the Conference Committee had over the years unanimously acclaimed the fundamental principles of objectivity, impartiality and independence on which the Committee of Experts assessed individual States' compliance with ratified Conventions. Contesting the role of the Committee of Experts and the supervisory system was a wrong way of dealing with legitimate differences of view, and the efficient operation of the Committee would be seriously impaired by any failure of harmony and cooperation between Employers and Workers.

12. The Employers' members stated that they understood but did not share the concern of the Workers' members that the image of the Committee of Experts might be in danger. Although they did not question the competence of the Committee of Experts within the framework of the supervisory system, they did not agree with all results of its work, and that they did openly and clearly. Repeatedly, the Workers' members had stated with respect to the question of who was allowed to give binding interpretations: "We share the Experts' opinion in this matter". If the Employers were correct they had to answer: "Then we all share the same opinion". For in 1991 the Committee of Experts had said in paragraph 11 of their report that it had "never regarded its views as binding decisions". With respect to the relation between the various supervisory bodies, the Committee of Experts stated in paragraph 12 "that its evaluations do not prevail erga omnes". The opinion which had been expressed by the Experts since 1991 and which had not since been changed was in line with the ILO Constitution, and with the historical development of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. The Employers had repeatedly indicated this. However, in the practice of the Conference Committee, there were deviations from the evaluations of the Experts. The Employers thought that this happened more often from the Workers' than from their own side.

13. The Workers' members of the Netherlands and the United States also noted that the Committee of Experts' qualities of objectivity, impartiality and independence are complemented rather than duplicated by the present Committee, whose role it is to bring the Experts' analyses to life through its discussions. The Workers' member of Germany urged the Committee of Experts not to show any weakness by yielding to possible pressure from certain employers and governments.

14. The Government member of Cuba considered that the present Committee should not impede the Committee of Experts or obstruct it from carrying out its independent, impartial and objective tasks.

15. Several Government members (Australia, Netherlands, United States) expressly reaffirmed their support for the supervisory machinery. The Government member of the United States considered that the Committee of Experts' report was based on sound objective and impartial legal analysis, which endowed the present Committee with greater authority and was in turn itself reinforced by the weight of the tripartite Conference. In her view, it was the Committee of Experts' international reputation for solid legal and technical work which had increased its independence over many years when its views had met with virtually no objections in this Committee. While it was true that the Committee of Experts' findings were not legally binding, and that there was a measure of interpretation in the functions of both Committees, the present Committee need not be too concerned with interpretation issues, when it is ongoing dialogue between the two Committees which is the key.

16. The Government member of Saudi Arabia (speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, United Arab Emirates) raised the question whether there was sufficient expertise in Islamic law in the Committee of Experts and the Standards Department. A Workers' member of Poland welcomed the appointment of a new female member to the Committee of Experts and hoped that male dominance of that body would be further reduced. The Committee was reminded by the representative of the Secretary-General that, in addition to Ms. Letowska of Poland, the Committee of Experts includes Ms. Al-Awadhi, an experienced jurist, of Kuwait; further, one post in the Standards Department would shortly be occupied by a native Arabic speaker, while another of regional adviser on standards for Arab countries would also be filled in July 1993.

17. The Workers' member of Japan suggested that, in order to safeguard its objectivity and impartiality, the Committee of Experts should, when examining individual cases, ensure that an Expert from the country in question would refrain from participating, so as to avoid undue outside pressure on the Expert.

(ii) Interpretation of Conventions

18. The Committee noted that an Office document (GB.256/SC/2/2) had been submitted to the Governing Body Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations at its May 1993 Session, concerning article 37, paragraph 2, of the Constitution and the interpretation of international labour Conventions, and that that Committee would continue its examination of the matter at a future session. Article 37 (2) empowers the Governing Body to "make and submit to the Conference for approval rules providing for the appointment of a tribunal for the expeditious determination of any dispute or question relating to the interpretation of a Convention".

19. The Employers' members stated that the document had been called for in discussions held in the Conference Committee in recent years, and they found it interesting and in many respects well-researched. Further consideration should be given in due course to whether a tribunal should be established under the Constitution, as to which the Employers reserved their judgement. The document showed that every supervisory body examining whether a State was fulfilling its obligations under a Convention had to undertake the task of interpretation, although only one – the International Court of Justice – could do so with binding authority. The fact that the Conference Committee might be considered a "political" body did not mean that it does not find its rightful place in the interpretation of Conventions, as paragraphs 19 and 20 of the document indicated, according to article 7 of the Conference Standing Orders. The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts did not regard its interpretations as establishing res judicata or decisions binding erga omnes.

20. As regards the principles and methods of interpretation, the Employers' members noted that the document referred to the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, as they themselves and the Committee of Experts had done in the past. Under Article 32 of the Vienna Convention it was clear that recourse should be had to preparatory work only as a supplementary means of interpretation in order to confirm an interpretation made under Article 31 or to correct an ambiguous or absurd result. Paragraphs 43 to 48 of the document were also unclear in that it was unrealistic to distinguish between diplomatic and tripartite conferences as bodies in which international treaties are elaborated: the decisive factor was that it is in international law States which have to fulfil obligations and to decide whether to incur them. Nor did Article 5 of the Vienna Convention help, as the ILO does not have its own rules on interpretation. Sometimes it was suggested or openly maintained that the Employers had formerly said something different. However, there was no contradiction of today's statements. The same had already been said in 1983 in the Employers' spokesman's comments regarding Conventions Nos. 87 and 96 under article 19. Further continuity could be found in the protocol of the 121st Session of the Governing Body from 3 to 6 March 1953. More than 40 years ago the then Employers' spokesman, Pierre Waline, had clearly rejected the deduction of a detailed right to strike from Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

21. The Employers' member of the United States remarked that disagreements over the method and substance of interpretations arose in only a small proportion of the vast number of comments made over the years by the Committee of Experts. The report of the Conference Committee that had led to the creation of the Committee of Experts stated that it would have no judicial capacity or competence to give interpretations of Conventions. Whilst the work of the Committee of Experts was clearly of the utmost importance to the work of the present Committee, it could not be presumed that this Committee would automatically accept Committee of Experts' interpretations, which had to be discussed sometimes over a period of time. Developing the indication in paragraph 22 of the document, he considered that parties who had drafted standards were in the best position to determine their meaning: this could not lead to "clandestine modification of meaning", as the Conference Committee meets in public. The Committee of Experts should highlight and explain any new interpretations in the general part of its reports in its observations on cases, and in general surveys, so that they are more readily evident to everyone. Otherwise, States may ratify Conventions with no notice or indication from the wording or legislative history of detailed interpretations subsequently made and tending in some instances towards "optimal" labour standards. Too detailed interpretation was another factor discouraging ratification.

22. The Workers' members reaffirmed their attachment to the interpretation of Conventions by an impartial organ such as the Committee of Experts or the International Court of Justice: they agreed with the Experts that, as long as the opinions of the former are not contradicted by the latter, they are valid and to be accepted. It was against the ground rules of the supervisory system for a government to criticize the conclusions of the Committee of Experts without having recourse to the Court. The procedures would be prolonged to the detriment also of constructive tripartite dialogue in the present Committee. A better solution was to reinforce the present supervisory bodies.

23. The Workers' members found the Employers' arguments as to the Vienna Convention political and legally unconvincing. Article 31 (3) (b) of the Convention meant that account should be taken of interpretations and viewpoints expressed by the competent organs of the Organization (viz. the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association); Article 5 preserves the specificity of UN specialized agencies such as the tripartite ILO. The Workers' members as a whole associated themselves with the analysis made by a Workers' member of Poland, that Article 5 of the Vienna Convention guarantees the autonomy of rules and working methods of the ILO, and that the ordinary meaning of the terms of a Convention concerning human rights (such as Convention No. 87) must be found in their context and in the light of the object and purpose of the Convention. Human rights Conventions must necessarily be interpreted progressively as living instruments.

24. The Committee entertained a wide-ranging exchange of views but reached no conclusion as to the advisability of setting up an article 37 (2) tribunal. The Workers' members, as regards possible application of article 37 (2), and the creation of a tribunal to resolve any question or overcome any difficulty in the interpretation of a Convention, consider such a step could question the credibility and authority of the Committee of Experts. Several members (e.g. the Government members of France, Nigeria, Spain, Syrian Arab Republic) expressed varying degrees of support for a tribunal which would speedily resolve disagreements on interpretation and take account of the ILO's characteristics. The Workers' member of Norway (speaking also on behalf of the Workers' members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden) compared article 37 (2) to similar provisions in the constitutions of other international organizations. Several other members (e.g. the Government members of Australia, Switzerland, United States) questioned the need for a tribunal, given the existing supervisory system, at least, in the view of the United States Government, until there was certainty that there would be no negative impact on the authority, credibility or effectiveness of those bodies. The Committee agreed that the matter required further study.

25. The representative of the Secretary-General assured the Committee its views would be brought to the attention of the Governing Body when it examined the document further, and the Committee would be informed of developments.

(iii) Reporting obligations

26. Following its discussions of governments' difficulties in meeting reporting obligations in recent years, the Committee was informed by the representative of the Secretary-General of preliminary consideration given by the Office to the possible rearrangement of the procedure for requesting reports, with the aim of maintaining and if possible improving the quality of the supervisory system, concentrating on cases of serious problems of application, and reducing the workload on national administrative authorities.

27. The Employers' members agreed with the approach taken by the Office in its internal working document. They recalled their concern that, alongside the increase in absolute terms in the numbers of reports due, following the accession to membership of the ILO of new States and the consequent new ratifications, the proportion of reports received continued to fall: this led to unequal treatment as between governments which meet their obligations and those which do not. The increasing numbers of reports posed a problem for the Office, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee.

28. The Workers' members stressed that no reform of the supervisory system must be allowed to weaken the application of Conventions in law and practice. The regular supervisory system should be maintained for all the Conventions classified by the Governing Body in 1987 as basic human rights ones, plus those on labour inspection, employment policy and tripartite consultation: reports on these should be requested automatically, in order to avoid discrimination between States, whilst cases of serious difficulty – including in respect of Conventions not regarded as basic human rights ones – should be dealt with outside the normal cycle as they are now and on the initiative of the present Committee. The Workers' members also reminded the Committee that governments' reports often do not give full information, which impedes an effective appreciation of the situation.

29. In a further exchange of views, membe[illegible] the Committee generally expressed support for the efforts being made to improve the reporting system, agreeing with the view that the changes must nevertheless not lead to weakening of the system. On the Workers' side, several speakers expressed particular caution and concern that prolongation of the reporting period should not lead to lowering of the standards being applied; one called on governments to make greater efforts to comply with their constitutional obligations. The Government member of the United States hoped eventual reforms to the reporting system would enable the Office and the Committee of Experts to focus more on long-standing, and emerging and potential problems of application; and when the Governing Body considered the Office's proposals it should insist on strict safeguards to ensure that a full, detailed report would be immediately requested and reviewed whenever there was a concern that there was or could be a problem with the application of a ratified Convention; nor should supervision be limited to the most flagrant violations of particular Conventions, but all ratified Conventions had to be fully implemented.

30. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office took careful note of all the statements made. He reassured the Committee that any future reforms would in no case be allowed to weaken the quality and effectiveness of the supervisory system. He hoped a balanced package of measures replacing certain automatic procedures with more selective and objective ones – stressing always the role of employers' and workers' organizations – would be possible.

(iv) Publication of the Committee of Experts' report

31. The Workers' members and several Government members referred to the inability of many delegations to prepare for the Conference, because they receive the Committee of Experts' report too late. For this reason, the Committee welcomed the Office's consideration of a proposal to the Governing Body which would mean bringing forward the date of the report's publication.

32. Several Government members (Egypt, Iraq, Saudi Arabia (speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, United Arab Emirates), Syrian Arab Republic) also drew attention to the delays caused by having to translate the Committee of Experts' report and other documents into Arabic. They called for early translations to be made available. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the comments relating to Arabic-speaking countries and the general part of the Committee of Experts' report are already translated into Arabic.

(v) Role of employers' and workers' organizations

33. The Committee underlined the important part played in the supervisory system by employers' and workers' organizations. This has become increasingly evident recently as the numbers of their comments on the application of Conventions noted by the Committee of Experts have risen to record levels. The operation of dynamic tripartism in the present Committee reflects both the natural interest which employers and workers have in the ILO's supervisory system and the socio-economic reality which is its background.

34. The Government member of Kenya attributed the great interest shown by employers' and workers' organizations in part to the constant efforts made by the supervisory bodies and the Office to furnish them with full information on their role.

II. Principles of standard-setting

(vi) Standard-setting policy

35. The Committee noted with interest the representative of the Secretary-General's indications as to the enhanced role of the International Labour Standards Department of the Office in preparing proposals for the Conference agenda for submission to the Governing Body, and in collaborating in the secretariat of each technical committee of the Conference elaborating standards. Together with the deployment of standards specialists in the field in 12 of the new multi-disciplinary teams, it is hoped that this will help better to meet the constituents' concerns, as expressed for example in the Conference Committee, at all stages in the life-cycle of international labour standards.

36. The Employers' members stressed the connection between the setting, ratification and practical application of standards: it was irrational to promote the setting of standards which were too far-reaching or complex, containing detailed rather than general aims, and which either could not be ratified or once ratified could not be translated into national law and practice.

37. The Government member of Switzerland suggested that, when the future of standard-setting policy is discussed, the ILO should become a sort of "social GATT", with the aim of creating conditions of competition balanced by universally recognized social standards. The Workers' members supported this suggestion. They also agreed with the Employers' view that the ILO's priority is the fight against poverty and realization of the objective of social justice, and they considered that it is through social rights and labour standards that the hopes of the Declaration of Philadelphia may be realized.

38. Several Government members (Australia, China, France, Islamic Republic of Iran, Kenya, Switzerland) spoke in favour of maintaining or increasing the degree of flexibility in standards. Another (Portugal) called for measures to encourage and if necessary assist member States to participate more fully in the various stages of the elaboration of standards. The Government member of Germany pointed out that some new Conventions pose difficulties as to their ratification because, as a result of compromises reached, they are inappropriately and unclearly worded.

39. The Workers' member of Argentina warned of the damage done to the standard-setting system, when Employers' members stated they were against the ratification of certain Conventions and in favour of reviewing others or making them more flexible. This had incited certain governments to disregard the requirements of Conventions, for example by simply cancelling large numbers of collective agreements. The arguments put forward by certain governments in favour of flexibility only contributed to the employers' cause, to the detriment of the workers. A remedy should be found to such situations.

(vii) Current changes: development and transition

40. Referring to paragraph 11 of the Committee of Experts' report, the Employers' members mentioned the transition of many countries to a market economy. These and other world developments presented new challenges and necessitated a review of all the ILO's activities, including standard-setting, supervision of standards, technical cooperation and the Organization's internal structure, as advocated in the International Organization of Employers document "Proposals for a thorough reform of the ILO".

41. The Workers' members emphasized the role of international labour standards, when the world had become dominated by the logic of the global marketplace, from which the workers often derive little or no benefit, even if overall economic growth is obtained. The ILO's 1993 edition of the World Labour Report shows the social cost of recent developments – including loss of freedom of association – and the danger of provoking protectionism. The Workers' members consider the social dimension vital to development strategy and rational economic structural adjustment. Democratization in itself does not guarantee the observance of standards, and the Director-General's 1994-95 budget proposals rightly link it to the fight against poverty and the improvement of social protection through the elaboration and supervision of international labour standards as the prime objectives of the Organization. Several new member States have already demonstrated their support for standard-setting by ratifying Conventions despite administrative and economic difficulties; and in the Workers' view international labour standards offer an excellent scenario for the labour market protagonists.

42. Further, the Workers' member of the United Kingdom recalled that Western governments and the Employers had earlier seen labour standards and human rights – including the right to organize and the right to strike – as bulwarks against Communism, and it seemed they now considered labour standards should conform to the laws of the market-place. Whilst communism had indeed failed both because it was economically inefficient and, moreover, because it did not respect human rights, it did not follow that the unregulated and exploitative free market should be welcomed without guaranteeing workers the protection of the same standards and rights.

43. Several members from countries in transition from a planned to a market economy (for example, the Government members of Bulgaria, China, Mongolia, Russian Federation) referred to the need for new social and labour legislation on the model not only of existing market economy countries but also of international labour standards. They hoped that the Office would continue to supply technical advice in this respect, as well as on other measures to deal with unemployment and the elimination of discrimination.

44. The Committee noted with approval the Committee of Experts' comments in the field of discrimination. It referred also to recent serious and inhuman acts of discrimination, particularly against ethnic and religious minorities in certain countries. Many members of the Committee strongly recommend to all States the ratification and full implementation of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

(viii) Universality of standards

45. The Committee's attention was drawn by many speakers to the importance of the principle of universality, both as regards the terms in which international labour standards are conceived and as regards their application. Some speakers indicated that, in order to ensure that standards lend themselves to implementation by developing as well as industrialized countries, they should be drafted as flexibly as possible. Others referred in this context to the Office's 1989 study of flexibility devices in Conventions (Governing Body document GB.244/SC/3/3), and to the increased role of the Standards Department in the preparatory work for possible new instruments.

46. Universality in the application of standards means that there should be no relativity or "double standards" in their interpretation and the manner in which they are supervised by the ILO. The Workers' members considered that the principle applies to the manner in which the Committee selects and treats individual cases: at neither stage should different criteria be used according to a country's economic or strategic importance, and it was a sinister practice to overlook failures by industrialized countries, while criticizing developing countries for their failures. The view was expressed that there should be equal treatment among States.

47. The Government member of Sri Lanka stated that he believed the prevailing situation in a country sometimes, despite repeated comments by the Committee of Experts, did not warrant the amendment of legislation involving minor, dormant divergencies from a ratified Convention. In such cases, there should be a flexible approach which took into account the country's social, economic and perhaps political environment, and the Committee of Experts should examine this matter further. The Government member of Malaysia also called for a more pragmatic and less legalistic approach by the present Committee and the Committee of Experts when considering the observance of ratified Conventions especially by developing countries and new member States.

(ix) The question of revision of standards

48. Several Government members referred in general terms to a perceived need to revise certain older Conventions; the Government member of Australia mentioned ones containing special provisions for women workers not now regarded as consistent with the principle of equal treatment.

49. The Workers' members pointed to the Report of the Governing Body Working Party on International Labour Standards (ILO: Official Bulletin, Special Issue, Vol. LXX, 1987, Series A – the "Ventejol Report"), examination of which showed that all existing Conventions in need of revision had by now been revised or were currently undergoing the procedures for possible revision. It was thus contrary to the Governing Body's position to suggest that some other standards – even fundamental human rights ones – should be revised in order to make them more flexible.

III. General aspects of the application of standards

(x) Ratifications

50. The Workers' members called for further ratifications by member States, including industrialized countries, and particularly of basic human rights Conventions. They also called for ratifications by new States formerly bound by Conventions as constituent parts of other States. They remarked on the differences between the regions as regards numbers of ratifications, and in this light stressed the role of the ILO's promotional activities.

51. The Government member of Portugal underlined the usefulness of ratifying and implementing the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), as a means of promoting the ratification of other Conventions. Others referred in this respect to the opportunity presented by article 19 general surveys for the Office, the Committee of Experts and the present Committee to clarify the provisions of Conventions perhaps causing difficulties to governments as regards ratification.

52. The Committee noted with interest the indications by several Government members that ratifications were envisaged or under consideration, as follows: Bulgaria (Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96); Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144)); China (Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170)); Mongolia (Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155)); Sri Lanka (Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144)); Suriname (Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158)); United States (Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)).

(xi) Denunciations

53. The Employers' members referred to the case where, in their view, Conventions had been adopted which proved ill-adapted to changing circumstances of fair competition in the labour market, such that the numbers of denunciations were accumulating. This had been so for the Night Work (Women) Convention, 1948 (No. 89), and for the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96).

54. The Workers' members did not agree that those denunciations were justified. They drew attention to the requirement under Article 5 (1) (e) of Convention No. 144 of tripartite consultations before denunciations are made. And they called for tightening of the procedures for denunciation laid down in the final articles of Conventions, so that in addition States denouncing be required to give detailed reasons for the denunciation or for not ratifying a revising instrument or for not re-ratifying a Convention with acceptance of more flexible provisions in it (as is possible in respect of Convention No. 96) and to seek solutions in order to avoid the denunciations. This could be done through a revision of the Final Articles Revision Convention, 1961 (No. 116). The Government member of Germany indicated that in the case of his Government's denunciation of Convention No. 96, the time-limits – which were very long by comparison with those for other international treaties – played a decisive role.

(xii) Submission to the competent authorities

55. Several members referred to the importance of fulfilling the Constitutional obligation to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference to the competent national authorities, as a first step towards possible ratification and implementation of standards. Some pointed out the practical difficulties in completing the submission procedure on time, especially when the authentic texts adopted by the Conference have to be translated into one or more national languages. The usefulness of assistance given by the Office in the drafting of submission documents was acknowledged by several members.

(xiii) Application of standards in particular circumstances: export processing zones and enterprises; offshore installations; maritime labour standards

56. The Workers' and other members welcomed the further attention given by the Committee of Experts to the problem of export processing zones and enterprises created in the hope of encouraging economic development and sometimes involving a relaxation of labour protection, following the present Committee's mention of it last year. It was recalled that ratified Conventions should be fully applied in conformity with international law, and special concern was expressed as to matters of freedom of association, discrimination and safety and health.

57. The Workers' member of Argentina observed that the general part of the Committee of Experts' report did not deal this year with offshore installations, seafarers on board ships flying flags of convenience, or fishing workers. The Committee's attention was nevertheless drawn by the representative of the Secretary-General to current consideration being given within the Organization to possible new maritime standards, and to the Committee of Experts' comments to individual States on the application of various Conventions to seafarers. The observer of the World Federation of Trade Unions stated that the exclusion of provisions of ratified ILO Conventions or restriction or abolition of freedom of association in export processing zones or other special economic zones was a violation not only of ILO Conventions but also of the Vienna Convention, which provides that a treaty must apply throughout the territory of a State.

(xiv) Freedom of association

58. The Employers' members discussed the issue of the interpretation of Conventions (see above, section I (ii)), particularly in connection with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the question of the right to strike. They indicated that they had consistently held the view that Convention No. 87 does not regulate the right to strike. The text of the Convention did not mention it, and the preparatory work showed the Conference had reached no consensus on the matter. Nor, in their opinion, could there be recourse to "relevant rules of the organization" under Article 5 of the Vienna Convention, since in this case there were no such rules, and under the related ILO procedures it was clear that the views taken by the non-governmental constituents (i.e. employers' and workers' organizations) would conflict. According to the Employers, Convention No. 87 had been interpreted as incorporating the right to strike 13 years after its adoption. Where there was doubt, the principle of international law in dubio mitius should be applied so as not to exaggerate the obligations of the Convention. However, the Committee of Experts had, the Employers stated, considered that a restriction of strikes was admissible only within very narrow limits, which was to the Employers legally incomprehensible. They hoped these questions would be dealt with in next year's article 19 general survey.

59. The Employers' members stated that in the legal order of the States, there were very different models for the legal classification of strike and lockout. One model could be sketched out as follows: a strike was regarded as a basic right that was established above the generally applicable legal order. In such a conflictual order, the social partners would have an antagonistic and irreconcilable stance. Under another model, labour disputes would also be part of a generally applicable order, a legal order which saw itself mainly as a peace order. Rights and duties of individuals and of interest groups would be balanced in relation to the rights of others and of the entire society. There were many variants of these models. Nothing indicated that the extreme conflictual model that set hardly any limits to strikes should be interpreted from Convention No. 87. Referring to the statement of a Workers' member of Germany, that the Employers were only opposing a certain interpretation of strikes because this would not coincide with their own interests, the Employers considered it natural that they should attend to their own interests and were directly affected by strikes, as they normally were directed against them. However, in today's production which was increasingly based on the principle of the division of labour, strikes more and more often also affected individuals and parts of society which were not at all involved. To this extent, it was much more important than in the past that the State established rules of law. It seemed strange that one speaker pointed out that the Employers had not been able to fully prove that the Vienna Convention was relevant for interpretation. In view of the fact that a legal question was not open to proof, this was not a task that the Employers' members had to undertake. As the applicability of the Vienna Convention was widely accepted and the Experts themselves were referring to it, there was no need for further comment. The Employers' members had already commented sufficiently on Article 5 of the Vienna Convention. Everybody was also familiar with the importance of Article 4 on non-retroactivity of the Vienna Convention. However, the Committee of Experts considered that a restriction of strikes was admissible only within very narrow limits. On page 186 of the English version of their report they state "that any prohibition or restriction of strikes should be confined to the following three cases: strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; strikes by public servants acting in their capacity as agents of the public authority; and strikes during an acute national crisis". This abstract basic formula was further developed until a very exactly defined right to strike arose which had a tendency to allow nearly any strike and therefore forbade any restriction. According to the Experts, a State that used a different yardstick violated its international duties. The Employers had repeatedly upheld that this was juridically incomprehensible. In substance, it appeared unacceptable to any State that its possible action be restricted to cases of endangering life, personal safety or health of the entire population or parts thereof. The Employers thought that it was a fundamental duty of every State to protect its citizens, even individuals, as comprehensively as possible. This was one of the basic reasons for the existence of a State.

60. The Employers' member of the United States considered that the decisions of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association were an inappropriate basis for defining the scope of the right to strike under Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, since those decisions depended on principles of the ILO Constitution and not the terms or legislative histories of the Conventions. The Employers' member of Turkey found the Committee of Experts' conclusions questionable, particularly with regard to Conventions

Nos. 87 and 98: the legislative history did not justify the position taken as to sympathy strikes, political strikes, and a strict notion of essential services. The Committee of Experts did not seem to accord employers their reciprocal right under Article 3 of Convention No. 87 to have recourse to lockouts. In view, nevertheless, of the link with freedom of association, a new Convention should be considered to regulate the right to strike. It would also be desirable for the general survey on Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 next year to give clear, reasoned explanations as to the right to strike, taking account of all the views expressed in this Committee.

61. The Workers' members strongly supported the views of the Committee of Experts with regard to the right to strike, which were in accord with the case-law of the Committee on Freedom of Association. They regarded the Employers' criticism as politically rather than legally motivated. The right to strike was inseparable from the notion of freedom of association, and the Workers hoped the next general survey would consolidate the principles already established on this point. They fully shared the views of a Workers' member of Germany, that various principles of freedom of association were regarded as part of customary law; the Committee of Experts' interpretation of the right to strike in Convention No. 87 had been accepted over many years, and this made it relevant under article 31 (3) (c) of the Vienna Convention. They also agreed with a Workers' member of Poland that the right to strike had to be seen in the light of the principle ubi jus ibi remedium as a last resort means of exercising the substantive rights of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. They equally agreed with another Workers' member of Germany that the right to strike could not be dissociated from other fundamental rights of workers; in fact, it was impossible to characterize the right to strike as interpreted by the Committee of Experts as an unlimited one.

62. The Government member of Germany observed that if the right to strike was contained implicitly in Convention No. 87, it was a matter of concern that the Convention was interpreted to imply not "the" but "a certain kind of" right to strike.

63. The Workers' member of Colombia reminded the Committee of the vital importance of the right to strike for workers where large numbers of trade unionists had even been assassinated for daring to exercise their rights. The Workers' member of Pakistan observed that, if workers are forbidden to exercise their right to strike, they are subjected to forced labour in violation of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. He noted that the right to strike is a fundamental one in UN instruments, but underlined that the strike is not an end in itself – rather a means of achieving real dialogue between the parties.

64. Two Workers' members of Poland referred also to the continuing problem of redistribution of trade union assets in countries where union pluralism has been restored. They urged the supervisory bodies to take an active stand in this matter so as to assist in the dismantling of the former monopolistic trade unions.

(xv) Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

65. The Committee discussed the Committee of Experts' general comments as to the implementation of a policy for full, productive and freely chosen employment. It fully agreed that employment policy should be the object of concertation with employers' and workers' organizations, and that many factors, such as training and economic and collective bargaining policies, must be taken into account, involving various government ministries and agencies.

66. The Employers' members again questioned the inclusion of a special section on Convention No. 122 in the general part of the Committee of Experts' report, although they found what was said realistic, particularly as to the countries in transition to a market economy. Labour market policy alone cannot create lasting jobs. The social partners, by the conclusion of collective agreements, themselves determine whether jobs are created or lost. The Employers' member of the United States stated that there was a need to open to change, when faced with the dynamic world economy, with ready availability of technology, instantaneous telecommunications and rapid transportation. Such an economy had resulted in a great deal of structural adjustment and governments, employers and workers were no longer in a position to address the consequences of these changes as if they still lived in closed economies. A single policy prescription was not necessarily the solution to these changes.

67. The Government member of Germany attributed the need for this section to the fact that the terms of the Convention allow the formulation of hypotheses rather than the establishment of violations.

68. The Workers' members hoped the Committee of Experts would continue to draw attention in its general report to Convention No. 122, insofar as employment and the right to work are a prerequisite to the existence of various other workers' rights: occupational safety and health, the right to organize, the right to strike. Unemployment could not be treated as a by-product of economic growth: in some countries it was no longer due only to recession but was becoming part of the system, and it behoved this Committee to voice concern for the unemployed and the poorest people in the world. The Workers' members pointed to the need under Article 3 of the Convention for governments to consult in advance organizations and representatives of different regions and sectors concerned, including the informal sector which is often overlooked. They detected a positive change in the attitudes of high officials of international institutions responsible for structural adjustment programmes (the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank) as to the impact of such programmes on the most disadvantaged sections of the population, although much remains to be done in this respect. The ILO stands for the social objectives which must be safeguarded in the face of enforced "liberalism" disguised as structural adjustment, and the 1994 High-Level Meeting in the ILO would deal with this aspect. Action on the part of the international community was needed in particular to ease the burden of foreign debt on developing countries.

69. A Workers' member of Poland considered that governments should report more fully on the Convention, so as to give the Committee of Experts sufficient grounds for conclusions. Policy in many countries in transition to a market economy unfortunately concentrated on the administration of the labour market for economic restructuring, with the provision of unemployment benefits regarded as a necessary evil: more attention should be given to the formulation and implementation of active policies for full and productive employment. As for developing countries in particular, the Government member of Nigeria noted that world recession made the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment very hard: the Committee of Experts should always take account of the existing economic situation when examining reports.

IV. Other standards-related activities

(xvi) Technical cooperation relating to standards

70. The Committee noted with interest the Committee of Experts' indications as to both the assistance given by the Office through the regional advisers on standards – soon to be superseded by technical advisers on standards forming part of the multidisciplinary teams – and the continuing improvement of coordination between standard setting and technical cooperation. The Government member of the United Kingdom looked forward in due course to reviewing the progress made in assisting ILO constituents with their standards-related problems. Several members (for example, the Government members of Namibia, Russian Federation, Suriname) gave examples of assistance they had received, illustrating how these activities help ensure not only the fulfilment of reporting obligations but also the actual implementation of standards. The Government member of Japan also reaffirmed his country's willingness to continue making contributions to the ILO's work, for example through multi-bilateral programmes in aid of seminars and symposiums and other forms of cooperation related to labour standards.

71. The Employers' members considered promotional measures by the Office at least as valuable in the implementation of standards as supervision and control in the traditional sense; the ILO's task for the future should not be underestimated. Therefore, every promotional measure represented an additional and important step which often could lead more rapidly to the desired goal.

72. The Workers' member of Pakistan spoke of the effort needed from employers' and workers' organizations to disseminate knowledge of what is done in the ILO in terms of international labour standards, and the ILO should do more in particular to provide guidance and training for workers in this respect.

73. The Workers' members stressed that promotional activities must not have the effect of weakening activities for the supervision of standards.

74. The Government member of Namibia expressed appreciation for ILO assistance in drafting a comprehensive Labour Act enshrining a policy of adhering and giving effect to international labour Conventions and Recommendations. The Government member of Kenya welcomed the emphasis on the ILO's advisory role as opposed to one of policing infringements of standards which were often due to socioeconomic and financial difficulties rather than a deliberate intention to violate labour standards. The Government member of China said that the ILO should increase its assistance of this kind, but that technical cooperation should not be used to impose pressure.

75. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated the Office's full agreement with the objective of increasing promotional activities, but it should be absolutely clear that this must in no case detract from supervisory activities, to which they are complementary.

(xvii) Collaboration with other international organizations, especially on human rights issues

76. The Workers' members recalled the specific tripartite structure and the mandate and competence of the ILO in social and economic matters and urged it to increase its influence as compared with the United Nations and certain other organizations, such as the financial institutions, so as to avoid being marginalized. The Committee considers that the ILO should improve its image and play a more active and critical role in the debate on labour and social issues in countries at all stages of development, including such areas as protection of children.

77. The Government members of Bulgaria and Uganda drew special attention to the need to intensify relations with the IMF and the World Bank, since their policies have such an impact on the ILO's work.

78. The Workers' members and the Government member of Belgium welcomed the ILO's active participation in the implementation, strengthening and improving of the European Social Charter of the Council of Europe.

79. The Committee welcomed the attention given by the Committee of Experts to the ILO's role in preparations for the June 1993 World Conference on Human Rights held in Vienna; and supported the action taken by the Office for the UN International Year of the World's Indigenous People, recalling the importance of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169). The Government member of Netherlands noted that the ILO actually functions very well in comparison with other organizations; he was concerned at the attempts being made at the Vienna World Conference to dilute the already weaker system for supervision of human rights in the United Nations and considered that UN bodies would do better to raise their level of supervision to that of the ILO rather than for the ILO to let its own working methods deteriorate.

80. The representative of the Secretary-General undertook to transmit to the Director-General of the ILO the wish expressed in the Committee for the strengthening of relations between the ILO and other international organizations, especially in the UN system, in order to avoid any isolation or marginalization of the ILO.

81. Following its discussion last year, the Committee discussed relations between the ILO's standard-setting and the activities of the European Community, particularly in the light of the Advisory Opinion of the Court of Justice of the European Communities on the question of the ratification of the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170) (referred to in document GB.256/SC/1/3). It noted that the Advisory Opinion does not wholly resolve the question of competence, but it hoped that it would now be possible for consultations and cooperation between the ILO and the EC to be intensified. The Workers' members hoped too that obstacles to ratification by EC member States of ILO Conventions on safety and health would now be overcome, and that those responsible in various regional organizations for drafting legal texts would pay special attention to the consequences for international labour standards. The Employers' members considered that relations between the ILO and the EC were not easy, especially when matters were touched on which, in the EC, member States were no longer competent. Efforts must in their view be undertaken to bring into harmony the obligations which some States had as members both of the ILO and of the EC. Participation of the social partners in ILO procedures constituted, the Employers considered, an important difference to the EC; the attempts to resolve this problem had not yet been concluded. A recent report of the Governing Body from 10 May showed that contacts between the ILO and the EC had been intensified and that consultations went on, the Employers' members stated. The Government member of Nigeria noted the increasing role of the European Community in ILO standard activities. He recalled the Advisory Opinion in question and doubted the competence of the European Community to conclude any Convention since the Community was not a member of the ILO; however, he stated, the constituent members of the Community are competent to ratify ILO standards which they have participated in formulating. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office would follow this matter very carefully and keep the Committee fully informed of developments.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution

Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981

82. The Committee reviewed the General Survey of the Committee of Experts which examined the effect given to the above-mentioned instruments on the basis of the reports submitted under article 19 of the Constitution and, in accordance with established practice, with regard to information communicated under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution. The survey also took due account of the comments received from 11 employers' and workers' organizations.

Aim of the instruments

83. The Committee considered the subject of the Convention and Recommendation important. The instruments have the dual objective of creating equality of opportunity and treatment in working life between men and women with family responsibilities, on the one hand, and between men and women with such responsibilities and workers without such responsibilities, on the other. It was stressed, in the survey, that the instruments formed an intrinsic part of any measures to promote equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women, an objective to which all countries should be committed, whatever their economic policy or stage of development. Referring to these explanations of the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members considered it just that the instruments had been placed among those which sought to enunciate fundamental human rights.

84. Echoing this view, the Workers' member of Australia suggested that the Convention and Recommendation were probably among the most important standards adopted by the ILO in relation to the promotion of equality between men and women workers. The Government member of China indicated that his Government was in favour of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment provided for in the Convention and Recommendation, as did the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, who expressed high evaluation for the provisions of Convention No. 156, which sought improvements for the family and so had an impact on social development. Recalling the progress made in the ILO's standard-setting since 1951, the Government member of Sweden noted that the instruments under review served not only the interests of women but concerned the development of national policies to enable all persons with family responsibilities to be employed free from discrimination on that basis: thus the standards supported also men in meeting their dual responsibilities.

85. The Employers' members supported the objective of creating conditions which would enable workers to combine their family and occupational responsibilities to the greatest extent possible. All employers had an obvious interest in supporting this goal, as a worker's full potential and capability would otherwise be lost.

86. The Committee noted that the survey had traced the way in which ILO standards in the field of equality had evolved from emphasizing, at first, measures to protect women workers before shifting their emphasis to the promotion of equality. More recently, there had been an insistence that equality implied action to accord equal opportunities and treatment to women and men in all respects. It was in this context that the Employment (Women with Family Responsibilities) Recommendation, 1965 (No. 123) – which was based on the assumption that women had a greater responsibility towards their families than did men – had been replaced by Convention No. 156 and Recommendation No. 165. Throughout this evolution, there had not been, however, any derogation from the concern to provide women and their unborn and newly-born children with an adequate standard of protection.

87. The Employers' members found some contradiction between those ILO standards which sought to introduce equal regulations for men and women when, at the same time, other instruments retained the notion of preferential treatment for women. On this point, the Workers' members considered as premature any suggestion that, with the exception of measures to protect maternity and the reproductory process, the need to ensure special protection for women had passed.

Scope and contents of the instruments

88. The Workers' members considered that the survey had resolved, in a convincing manner, certain misunderstandings and important questions of interpretation that had constituted obstacles to the ratification of the Convention. Particular mention was made of the Experts' clarification of the relationship between Convention No. 156 and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111), 1958. Special measures in favour of women workers with family responsibilities were not incompatible with the requirements of Convention No. 156 and might in fact be indispensable to achieve effective equality between men and women under Convention No. 111. It was relevant to this point that the Workers' member of Poland considered Convention No. 156 to be a "lex specialis" for the fundamental rules of non-discrimination prescribed in Convention No. 111.

89. The Workers' members also made specific reference to Article 8 of Convention No. 156, which was cited as one of the main reasons that provoked the Employers' members to abstain from the final vote on the adoption of the 1981 instruments. The explanation offered in the survey made it clear that the requirement of Article 8 should no longer constitute an important impediment to ratification, even for countries which had not ratified the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158). Commenting on the way in which flexibility was often belied by apparently general clauses, the Government member of Germany stated that it was extremely difficult to ensure that Article 8 operated to the advantage, rather than to the disadvantage, of a worker with family responsibilities. In his view, several countries had been dissuaded from ratifying the Convention through fear that Article 8 could be interpreted as prohibiting termination because of the mere existence of family responsibilities. In opposition to this view, the Workers' member of Germany referred to an opinion of the Office (made in response to a request of the Government of Germany), stating that while termination of a labour contract was excluded solely on the grounds of family responsibilities, termination might be justifiable on other grounds.

90. The Workers' member of Poland regretted that the survey had not taken into account the general comments of the Human Rights Committee concerning the application of Article 40 of the UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which had touched on the notion of the extended family. The speaker urged the ILO not to overlook the emerging jurisprudence and case-law of the UN treaty-based monitoring bodies.

91. The Employers' members noted that the Committee of Experts had underlined the considerable flexibility of application afforded by the Convention, a feature which the Experts considered evidently to have been the intended outcome of the preparatory work. The Employers' members considered that the Convention had in fact introduced a new concept of flexibility, in that the principal requirements of the instrument enunciated hardly any specific measures, but referred instead, in a comprehensive way, to particular objectives. In their view, it became difficult to formulate objectives in a clear, juridical manner when there was an attempt to extend the scope of standards beyond the worker-employer relationship to address general problems in society.

92. In this respect, the Employers' members referred to Article 3 of the Convention which, in calling for the adoption of a policy leading to complete equality of opportunity and treatment, implied the achievement of a totally conflict-free combination of family obligations and a career. As the instrument's other provisions were more specific only in regard to particular areas such as training and education and community and regional planning, the comprehensive objectives of Article 3 were underpinned simply by other objectives, also without precise contours. Such an approach had resulted in overloading the instruments with comprehensive and idealistic targets. Accordingly, the Employers' members did not consider the standards allowed for any particular degree of flexibility. This assessment was confirmed by the fact that the second chapter of the survey described as insufficient the policies and measures existing in certain States.

93. The Workers' member of Germany urged that the concept of flexibility be defined more closely and precisely: did the concept mean that there should be flexibility regarding the implementation by different national systems, or was there to be flexibility in the lowering of standards, thus allowing for the possibility of discriminating against workers with family responsibilities?

94. The instruments sought to promote an evolution in the respective roles of men and women, which the Workers' members supported fully, noting in this respect the change of attitude on the part of a large number of governments and a growing number of employers in the 12 years since the adoption of the instruments. In the view of the Employer's members, the traditional form of standard-setting lent itself only in a limited way to dealing with the respective roles of men and women, as many of the questions in this area were dependent on individual values and attitudes: thus, standards could not impose a specific ideal or model and different cultural traditions had to be taken into account. In the same vein, traditional relationships could not be changed either by legislation or by other initiatives of the State, though these might inspire a gradual and partial transformation. Changes in attitude and social phenomena had their own dynamics and timeframe.

95. In the discussion, allusions were made to the enterprise-level benefits to be derived from applying the principles contained in the ILO standards. The Workers' members referred to paragraph 253 of the survey which indicated that strategies introduced by employers in conformity with the Convention have proven beneficial, rather than detrimental, in economic terms. The Workers' member of Australia confirmed that substantial and quantifiable increases in productivity and improved efficiency had been noted in workplaces where policies responding to the needs of workers with family responsibilities had been adopted. The Government member of Sweden supported the proposal that the Office publish information on the benefits reaped by enterprises through the application of the principles of the instruments.

96. The Employers' members considered that since enterprises were concerned primarily with being profitable, their main task was not to provide a family-friendly environment. Steps could, of course, be taken to promote a more harmonious combination of family and work responsibilities and employers were continuing with, and enhancing, these measures. It was regretted by the Employers' members, however, that such developments were not particularly promoted by Convention No. 156; if they were taking place, this was despite the Convention.

Timeliness of the survey

97. The Workers' members considered the subject-matter of the survey an appropriate choice. Its selection was justified by the ILO's current activities concerning women workers, as well as by the need to respond to the Resolutions concerning equality of opportunity and treatment, which had been adopted by the International Labour Conferences in 1985 and 1991, respectively. Furthermore, though there had been a significant increase in the proportion of women entering the labour force, the great majority of women continued to be employed in low-paid jobs at the bottom of the occupational hierarchy.

98. Some Workers' members stated that, even though the legal protection for women had been improved in many jurisdictions, this did not necessarily mean that progress had been made in practice. The representative of the World Federation of Clerical Workers cited instances of practices in Latin American countries, where some employers required women workers periodically to present proof that they were not pregnant or, as in the case of the banks in Ecuador, to sign blank letters of resignation, which were brought into effect as soon as the women became pregnant. In a number of countries, workers in the commercial sector – of whom the majority were women – were obliged to work on Sundays, when crèches were closed. The lack of policies and official measures concerning child care had resulted in vast numbers of abandoned street children in, for instance, Brazil and Colombia, many of whom were murdered.

99. Labour conditions for women workers were said by some Workers' members to have worsened as a result of the social effects produced by structural adjustment measures being implemented in the developing countries of Latin America. The Workers' member of Nicaragua stated that there had been a serious deterioration in the situation of women workers in her country, with women representing 60 per cent of the unemployed workforce. This had resulted in an alarming increase in the level of prostitution in the urban areas, a prevalence of sexual harassment and a steep rise in the incidence of blackmail and humiliation of women. Discrimination in the agricultural sector was extremely serious, with gynaecological examinations being required prior to hiring. The establishment of export processing zones had, in many countries, resulted in the permanent violation of the human rights and dignity of the women employed in such zones.

100. In the countries of Eastern and Central Europe, paid holidays and paid leave to care for sick family members had been reduced, according to the Workers' member of Poland. Many women were, moreover, employed in workplaces in conditions which were particularly arduous for their health and safety. The fact that male workers were deprived of certain rights that were granted to women workers resulted in discrimination against the women through the legislative imposition of greater responsibilities with respect to the family, rather than leaving couples the freedom to determine for themselves how they might share those duties. The majority of discriminatory provisions that were in violation of Convention No. 156 were also breaches of Convention No. 111; as Convention No. 111 had been ratified by many countries, recourse should also be sought under its provisions.

101. The Workers' member of Pakistan drew attention to paragraph 265 of the survey where it had been pointed out that the position of women in the labour market still tended to mirror their traditional domestic role. It was in the interests of the family that women had access to gainful employment, the lack of which was accentuated in the least developed countries, and especially in rural areas where women were not protected by labour legislation concerning minimum wages, social security and working conditions and were, consequently, the poorest groups in those countries. In urban areas, women were also confined to low status precarious jobs, characterized by poor remuneration and lacking in opportunities for education, training and career development. Trade unions were thus obliged to promote equality for women not only in education and training but also as concerned their entry into employment so that women's status was commensurate with their contribution to society. However, it was also the duty of employers and the State to encourage women to enter the labour force with adequate protection against any form of discrimination. Member States could demonstrate their political will to bring about the necessary changes by ratifying and implementing the Convention.

Final remarks

102. The Workers' members considered that the survey had clarified considerably the requirements of those provisions that appeared to have given rise to questions of compliance by States concerned to ratify the Convention. They did not consider justified the criticisms regarding the lack of flexibility accorded by the Convention, as several of its Articles were phrased in ways that would enable account to be taken of the economic difficulties and particular situations prevailing in individual countries. The flexibility of the instruments had been welcomed by the Workers' members during the discussion and adoption of the instruments in 1981. The Workers' members felt that the implementation of the instruments should be organized at all levels – national, regional, sectoral and at the level of the undertaking – in a complementary manner. If the initiative to take appropriate measures were left to individual enterprises, this would result in the differential treatment of workers employed in small and medium undertakings and those working in poor and unorganized sectors.

103. While noting the explanations advanced in the survey for the low level of ratification of the Convention, the Workers' member of Poland considered that more could be done were governments to consult the representative workers' organizations in their countries to bring about the adoption of a consistent policy to achieve the objectives of the instrument. Noting that only 11 observations had been received from workers' and employer's organizations, the speaker also suggested that the Office and the Committee of Experts encourage governments to consult with the representative organizations with a view to obtaining their comments on unratified Conventions, an obligation that was more clearly set forth under article 22 of the ILO Constitution, than under article 19. The Workers' member of Pakistan also raised for consideration the possibility that requests for information on unratified Conventions be sent to workers' and employers' organizations to permit them to respond directly.

104. While considering the objectives of Convention No. 156 not only understandable, but meaningful and sensible, the Employers' members restated their view that it was not possible to attain those objectives through the application of the instrument or through legal prescription. Awareness and a change of attitude were needed. It was difficult for ratifying member States to translate the general and far-reaching provisions of the Convention into practice, a factor that explained the low level of ratification of the instrument. Accordingly, the Employers' members suggested that Convention No. 156 be classified among those instruments seriously in need of revision, in the hope that a redrafted Convention could be framed in more practicable and realistic terms.

105. The information and explanations contained in the survey were appreciated by many speakers both from States that had ratified the Convention and from those which had not taken that step. The Government member of Sweden pointed out that despite the desire for change in accordance with the instruments, women still bore a disproportionate share of the double burden of work and family responsibilities, as was evidenced by the growing proportion of women forced to undertake part-time work. While conceding that attitudes could not be regulated, she stressed that the standards nevertheless provided a supportive legal and political framework in which the social partners could give practical effect to the objectives of the instruments. The Government member of Australia stated that, even though the Convention had already been ratified, the survey would prove helpful in assisting her Government to develop further appropriate measures to achieve the objectives of the Convention, since it contained a comprehensive review of measures taken in other States. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic expressed the intention of his Government to endeavour to adapt national legislation in the direction prescribed by Convention No. 156. The Government member of China indicated that while the standards set out in the Convention and Recommendation on the provision of household service had not been reached because of the country's insufficient development of the social service sector, nevertheless the Government was making efforts to implement the instruments and hoped to ratify the Convention in the near future. The importance of the Convention was also attested to by the Workers' member of Iceland, who indicated that the labour movement in her country was preparing to apply pressure on the Government to ratify the Convention.

106. For many speakers, the survey was an important contribution to the activities to be undertaken in 1994, declared the International Year of the Family by the United Nations. The Workers' members called upon the ILO to take measures to encourage the ratification of Convention No. 156 during 1994. The representative of the World Federation of Clerical Workers considered, in this regard, that a vigorous international awareness campaign should be undertaken by the ILO to promote the subject of the survey; and for this, she offered the collaboration of her organization, as well as that of the Latin American Commission of Female Workers. The Workers' member of Uruguay stressed the importance of investing in the family which was, after all, the basic unit of society: that investment would bear fruit for everyone. The ILO had a fundamental role to play in promoting the ratification of Convention No. 156 for the benefit of all members of society. These sentiments were supported by the Government member of Sweden who also suggested that the ILO make every effort to disseminate information on the implementation of the instruments, both shortcomings and successes, to both United Nations and ILO constituents in order to promote equality worldwide and to inspire more States to ratify Convention No. 156. In the view of the Workers' member of Iceland, the importance of the instrument for the activities of 1994 was summarized in paragraph 7 of the survey, which stated that while pregnancy, confinement and breastfeeding were uniquely, biologically, a woman's province, reproduction was itself a social function that should be protected by society.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

107. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would apply the same working methods and criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

108. In applying those methods, the Committee decided, on the proposal of the Workers' members supported by the Employers' members, to invite all governments concerned by the comments in paragraphs 87 (compliance with reporting obligations), 93 (supply of first reports), 96 (lack of reply to comments of the supervisory bodies), 121 (special problems relating to submission) and 125 (lack of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations) of the Committee of Experts' report to supply information to the Committee in one half-day sitting to be devoted to those cases. This, it was hoped, would serve to increase the impact of the discussion and conclusions and make better use of the time devoted by the Committee to those cases.

109. The Committee noted that this new approach had produced interesting results as a first trial. Nevertheless, it should in no sense be understood by governments as dispensing them from the need to take part in the Committee's discussions. The Committee looks forward to next year, when the procedure will be further refined, to enable it to ensure the fullest possible examination of all these cases. In the Committee's view, it is essential to find the best possible means of improving its effectiveness in this respect.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

110. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

111. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that considerable efforts to fulfil the submission obligation had been made in certain States, namely: Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau.

112. The Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress achieved and expressed the hope that there would be further improvements in States that still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

113. The Committee noted with regret that no indication was available that steps had been taken in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1985 and 1991 by the 71st to 78th Sessions of the Conference to the competent authorities, in the cases of Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Belize, Cambodia, Congo, Guyana, Jamaica, Kenya, Madagascar, Pakistan, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Zaire.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

114. In Part B of this report (General questions relating to international labour standards) the Committee has considered amongst other things the fulfilment by States of their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. 17.1 per cent of the reports due had been received by 15 October 1992, the date fixed by the Governing Body, the highest figure since 1982 (the figure was 13.4 per cent in 1991). By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received had risen to 65.4, which is the lowest recorded since 1946. Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 75.8 per cent (as compared with 76.8 per cent in June 1992 and 83.7 per cent in June 1991). This year, the Committee of Experts noted that 56 per cent of the reports on Conventions for which information on practical application was requested contained such information, slightly higher than in 1991 and 1992 (50 per cent), but less than in 1989. The Committee emphasizes the importance of sending practical information, without which it is impossible to know if a Convention is actually being applied. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in appealing to governments to make every effort to include the necessary information in future reports.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

115. The Committee noted with regret that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for two years or more by the following States: Albania, Cambodia, Guinea-Bissau, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Seychelles, Somalia.

116. The Committee also noted with regret that no first reports due since 1990 on the following ratified Conventions had been supplied by Cameroon (Convention No. 162) and Yemen (Conventions Nos. 122, 156, 158). It stresses the special importance of first reports, on which the Committee of Experts bases its first evaluation of compliance with ratified Conventions.

117. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts noted that 40 governments had not communicated replies to most or any of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 318 cases (compared with 330 cases last year and 335 two years ago). The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 14 of the governments concerned had sent replies, which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

118. The Committee noted with regret that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1992 from the following countries: Afghanistan, Angola, Bahamas, Belize, Central African Republic, Côte d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Ethiopia, France, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Iraq, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Nepal, Niger, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen, Zimbabwe; France (French Guiana, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Réunion, Saint Pierre and Miquelon).

119. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Afghanistan, Angola, Bahamas, Côte d'Ivoire, France, Iraq, Kuwait, Malawi, Zimbabwe.

Application of ratified Conventions

120. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. The Committee of Experts listed in paragraph 102 of its report new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 44 such cases, relating to 32 States and two non-metropolitan territories in all regions of the world. Almost 2,000 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

121. At its present session, the Committee was informed of other instances in which measures had recently been or were about to be taken by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the present Committee welcomes them as fresh evidence of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

122. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to various important cases which it had to consider.

Cases of progress

123. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases – including many involving basic human rights – governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee. It considers highlighting these cases as a positive approach towards influencing governments to respond to comments of the supervisory bodies. In this respect, it refers to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

Special cases

124. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussions of the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, a full record of which appears in Part Two of this report.

125. As regards the application by Myanmar of the Freedom of Association and the Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the information repeated by the Government representative according to which his Government was committed to a process of change in the country's legislation in order to guarantee trade union rights. Nevertheless, the Committee recalled that the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee had indicated to the Government, over a period of several years, the provisions of the legislation requiring amendment and up to now these changes in the legislation had not yet been accomplished. Consequently, the Committee expressed its deep concern and firmly urged the Government to adopt, in the very near future, the necessary measures in legislation and practice to guarantee to all workers and all employers without any distinction and without prior authorization the right to organize even outside the existing trade union structure should they so wish. The Committee trusted that it would be able to take note of substantial progress in the application of the Convention and requests the Government to transmit relevant detailed information in its next report.

126. The Committee trusts that the government concerned will take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invites it to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in the observance of its obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Convention in question.

Continued failure to implement

127. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiences, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee noted with grave concern that there had been continued failure over several years to eliminate serious discrepancies in the application by Sudan of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

128. The Governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 125 and 127 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information to enable the Committee to follow up the abovementioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

129. The Committee notes that 153 of the 280 article 19 reports requested on the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981, were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further 10 since, making 58.2 per cent in all.

130. The Committee noted with regret that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by the following: Cambodia, Djibouti, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen, Zaire.

Communication of copies of reports to workers' and employers' organizations

131. Once again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23 (2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

132. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 45 governments which collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussions of their individual cases.

133. The Committee is pleased to note that all governments invited and present at the Conference took part in the discussions concerning their countries.

134. The Committee notes with regret that the Government of one State which was not represented at the Conference, namely Seychelles, was unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to it. It decided to mention this country in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform the Government, in accordance with the usual practice.

135. The Committee has continued to strive to perform its role of examining information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations according to its well-established working methods and traditions, but at the same time to meet the challenges posed by the changes which the Organization is undergoing. This has meant accepting the need for – and indeed promoting – innovation designed to improve the supervisory system. The Committee counts the strengthening of dialogue with the Committee of Experts, evidenced by the presence of the Chairman of that Committee during its general discussion, an undoubted success. It keeps an open mind on the possibility of other innovations to come – for example, in the means available of obtaining interpretations of Conventions, in the further reform of the reporting system, or in the more economical use of its own limited time for discussion. It emphasizes above all that the dynamism, the assiduity and the effectiveness of the ILO's system of the supervision of international standards are a peerless heritage both to be cherished and preserved, and to be constantly burnished and put to good use.

136. Finally, the Committee noted with interest that the Committee of Experts had decided to include in its next report its reflections on the present ILO system of setting and supervising standards and its future in the twenty-first century. The present Committee decided to devote a special sitting next year to the same subject. This will enable it too to contemplate the ILO's truly remarkable experience in the field of international standards in the perspective of the decades to come.

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

(a) Failure to supply reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Employers' members noted that regular reports on the application of Conventions were the foundation of the supervisory machinery. Although the crisis concerning reporting had been discussed in the general discussion and an effort was being made to improve the situation, existing obligations must be observed as otherwise the system would become imbalanced or would dissolve altogether. On the one hand, a number of countries were regularly submitting reports, while on the other hand, a growing number of countries were not, and as a result the credibility of the supervisory system was in question. They observed that 45 countries were listed in the report as not having met their obligations to submit reports on ratified Conventions, but in the list of cases to be discussed only eight countries were mentioned. This had occurred because the other 37 States had eventually submitted their reports, but only after a major delay so that they could not be taken into account in the report of the Committee of Experts. The Employers' members suggested that countries which systematically were submitting their reports late should also be highlighted. They requested that all member States meet their obligation to provide reports punctually, and asked that the eight countries which had not supplied reports be listed individually in a special paragraph.

The Workers' members fully subscribed to the comments of the Employers' members, particularly with respect to the vital importance of punctual sending of reports. Late sending prevented the Committee of Experts from carrying out its work; time was required for such matters as translations of documents and research, and when due dates were not complied with there were inordinate difficulties and a breakdown of the process.

The Committee, recalling the importance of sending the reports on the application of ratified Conventions which constituted the foundation of the supervisory system, trusted that the Governments of Albania, Cambodia, Guinea-Bissau, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Seychelles and Somalia would present the reports due concerning ratified Conventions, since as of this date they had not done so. The Committee decided to mention these cases in an appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

(b) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Workers' members stressed the importance attached by the Committee of Experts to the obligation of a ratifying State to supply a first report. A first report was the basis of all the supervisory work of the Committee of Experts and it enabled this Committee to assess the implementation of a Convention in law and practice because a fair amount of detail should be provided in such first reports. They referred to paragraph 93 of the Report of the Committee of Experts in which it was stated that, of the 121 first reports due, a total of 75 had been received by the time the Committee of Experts' session opened, which in their view suggested that in future this problem could involve more than the two cases cited there, namely Cameroon (Convention No. 162) and Yemen (Conventions Nos. 122, 156 and 158). The failure to send first reports following ratifications, decided upon after due reflection, in their view put in doubt the seriousness of such ratifications. They expressed the hope that progress may be made in this matter.

The Employers' members fully supported the views expressed by the Workers' members and considered that certain doubts could arise regarding the real intention of countries to apply Conventions that they have voluntarily ratified. The supply of a first report should logically follow the approval and ratification of a Convention. They noted that, in reality, more countries than the two mentioned by the Experts had failed to provide first reports within a year, even if the Committee had shown some indulgence towards them in this respect. They nevertheless expressed the importance of the timely supply of complete first reports so as to enable the supervisory bodies to be effective. They urged the Governments of Cameroon and Yemen to supply such reports and requested that these two countries be cited in the general part of the report of this Committee.

A Government representative of Cameroon stated that her country had always respected its obligations under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution and that this was the first time that her country had been mentioned for not having communicated reports on ratified Conventions. She indicated that such reports had been communicated on 10 May 1993 and asked for the forbearance of this Committee concerning this delay, which was due to reasons that were independent of the will of the Government. She assured the Committee that this situation would not recur.

The Committee took note of the verbal explanations offered by the Government representative of Cameroon to the effect that the report had been sent. The Committee hoped that the case of Yemen would be resolved quickly. It recalled the importance of sending the first report on a Convention which the country had ratified. The Committee decided to mention these two cases in an appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

(c) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

The Workers' members emphasized that the supply of information in response to comments made by the Committee of Experts was particularly vital, as such dialogue was indispensable for the work of the Committee. Although it was possible for the case of a country which failed to reply to be discussed in the Committee, often the Government in question would read out to the Committee a lengthy report that was impossible to understand on first hearing. On the other hand, if the Government had submitted the report in the first place to the Committee of Experts, an assessment of the report could have been made prior to the case coming before this Committee for consideration. Member States which did not reply did not escape examination by the Committee of Experts, but instead hampered its work and made it more difficult to obtain an up-to-date assessment of the situation in question. They recognized that a large number of countries did reply generally to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, but hoped that the small group that did not do so would fulfil this obligation in the future.

The Employers' members noted that the high number of requests by the Committee of Experts for replies to its comments was the result of reports which had been submitted that contained major shortcomings, were incomplete or were insufficiently clear. They reiterated their appeal that member States live up to their obligations in a more clear, punctual and complete fashion.

The Government member of Germany, in referring to the list of countries contained in paragraphs 87 and 96 of the Committee of Experts' reports, explained that the majority of the countries mentioned in paragraph 96 were also mentioned in paragraph 87, and that only six countries were mentioned only in paragraph 96. This meant that for the majority of the countries mentioned in paragraph 96 it could be observed that they had not responded to the questions raised by the Committee of Experts since they simply had not supplied the reports. He asked whether it would not be better to mention in this paragraph only the governments which had sent the reports but without responding therein to the questions raised, and to distinguish this case from those in which the governments had not supplied reports at all and therefore had not responded to the questions of the Committee of Experts.

A Government representative of Afghanistan stated that, as a result of the civil war, his country was faced with communication problems which were an obstacle to the sending of reports. He explained that this year it had not received any information on the Conference, and that of all of the ratified Conventions, reports had not been supplied on only five of them. He undertook to send the requested reports on these five Conventions.

A Government representative of Angola explained that it had not been possible to supply the information requested by the Experts on time because of mail delays in Angola. He assured the Committee that the Government would provide a full reply to the comments addressed to it.

A Government representative of the Bahamas apologized to the Committee for the failure of his Government to send replies to the questions within the specified time periods and recalled the explanations that the Government delegate of his country had made before the plenary of this Conference on Monday, 7 June 1993 on the situation which his country had experienced since 1988 and its desire since August 1992 to re-establish normal relations with the international organizations. He assured the Committee that the Government would provide a full reply to the comments which had been addressed to it.

A Government representative of Cameroon recalled, with regard to observations made by the Committee in paragraph 96 of the Report of the Committee of Experts, that the Committee had not received a reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts for the same reasons that it had also not received the first reports on the application of ratified Conventions. She assured the Committee that the Government would supply a full reply to the comments which had been addressed to it.

A Government representative of Côte d'Ivoire stated, with regard to observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts concerning Conventions Nos. 29, 52, 87 and 136, that his Government had sent a reply on 27 February 1993 but did not then have all the necessary information. He drew this Committee's attention to the fact that the economic and social context of his country sometimes made the collection of requested information difficult and, to a greater extent, made problematic the communication of such requested information between Côte d'Ivoire and the ILO. He assured the Committee that the Government would try to send a full reply to the comments which had been addressed to it.

A Government representative of France, while indicating that his country could also have been mentioned for the omissions evoked under the preceding point, requested the Committee to excuse it for not having supplied within the desired time the replies to observations of the Committee of Experts. He stated that his Government was required to send at least 253 reports this year and that the omission, for which it was at fault, should not in any way be considered a change in attitude on its part towards the supervisory system of the ILO, but was simply attributable to an administrative lapse that he hoped the Committee would understand and which he was convinced would not recur.

A Government representative of Iraq stated that his Government regretted all the more not having supplied on time its responses to the Committee of Experts' comments since his country was very dedicated to international labour standards, maintained a continuous dialogue with the social partners and generally attended to supplying on time the reports due on ratified Conventions. He assured the Committee that his Government would endeavour to supply a full reply to the comments that had been addressed to it.

A Government representative of Kuwait regretted that for the first time since 1961, the year when it joined the Organization, his country would be mentioned for not having met one of its obligations. He asked the Committee to understand that the destruction which his country recently had undergone hindered competent administrative services from carrying out their normal duties, and he assured the Committee that the comments of the Committee of Experts would receive a prompt reply.

A Government representative of Malawi stated that the replies to the Committee of Experts' comments concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 111 and 144 would be finalized soon and communicated to the Office. Contacts and discussions had been held with the Minister of Health regarding comments made on the first report on the application of the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) and an appropriate response would be submitted to the Office in due course.

A Government representative of Zimbabwe stated that his Government had not communicated the infomation required on the comments of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Tripartite Consultation Convention, 1976 (No. 144) due to technical, administrative and communications problems. Having taken note of the comments, he gave the assurance that the replies would be communicated.

The Workers' member of Kuwait stated that the problem of the non-supply of replies to comments was not a new one and was an obstacle to the work of the Committee of Experts. Certain governments communicated replies only after the meeting hoping in that way to avoid replying to the questions raised. Ratification implied respect of the minimum standards and countries should raise the level of their national standards to match those contained in the Conventions. Referring to the intervention of the Government representative of Iraq, the speaker considered that that country had indeed ratified a large number of Conventions but it did not at all respect them.

The Government representative of Iraq declared that his country was attaching great importance to the application of international labour standards and had always provided the replies.

The Committee took due note of the oral information provided by the Government representatives of Afghanistan, Angola, Bahamas, Cameroon, Côte d'Ivoire, France, Iraq, Kuwait, Malawi and Zimbabwe. It stressed the importance for the preservation of the necessary dialogue and of the communication of clear and complete information in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts. In this connection, it expressed its profound concern at the very high number of failures to reply to requests for information from the Committee of Experts.

It recalled that the assistance of the Office may help governments to overcome some of the difficulties mentioned in the discussion. The Committee urged the Governments concerned (Afghanistan, Angola, Bahamas, Belize, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Côte d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Ethiopia, France, Guinea Bissau, Guyana, Iraq, Kuwait, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Nepal, Niger, Saint Lucia, São Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen and Zimbabwe) to spare no efforts so that the information requested would be communicated as soon as possible. The Committee decided to mention these cases in an appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

(d) Failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

The Employers' members recalled that the choice of unratified Conventions on which the reports were requested was made by the Governing Body with the aim of having information on the situation in law and in practice with regard to a given Convention. The reports communicated formed the necessary base to evaluate the situation in the various countries and were also very valuable in envisaging future measures, in particular with regard to the eventual need to revise the instruments. The Employers' members noted the low percentage of the reports received (54.9 per cent) as well as the fact that 13 countries listed had not supplied any reports for the past five years. Recalling that the governments which communicated information under article 19 of the ILO Constitution did not have to fear criticism, they insisted that States should comply with their obligations in the future. The failures to do so should be mentioned in the appropriate part of the report.

The Workers' members, sharing the view of the Employers' members, pointed out that a General Survey was particularly valuable when a State was envisaging the ratification of a Convention.

The Committee stressed the importance of this constitutional obligation to send reports on non-ratified Conventions and Recommendations. These reports permitted, in particular, an assessment of the situation throughout the world in the context of general surveys. The Committee urged all States to fulfil their obligations in this regard. It hoped that the Governments of the following countries: Cambodia, Djibouti, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Yemen and Zaire would duly meet their obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution in the future. The Committee decided to mention these cases in an appropriate paragraph of its General Report.

Antigua and Barbuda. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 11, 17, 19, 29, 81, 87, 98, 105, 111 and 138 and the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

China. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 11, 17, 19, 29, 81, 87, 98, 105, 111 and 138, and the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

Costa Rica. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 11, 92, 113 and 148 and the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

Dominica. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 11, 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 26, 29, 81, 87, 94, 97, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 138 and the replies to certain of the Committee's comments.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 5: Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Singapore (ratification: 1965). A Government representative stated that his Government strongly believed that, in principle, the employment of children and young persons below the age of 14 in industrial undertakings should be prohibited. Exemption should only be given where there were very good reasons to do so and where the health and safety of young persons was not compromised. On this basis the Employment Act prohibited the employment of children below the age of 12. For young persons at the age of 13, employment was also prohibited in industrial undertakings unless written approval was granted by the Commissioner for Labour. The speaker had explained the reasons why this provision was retained in the law pointing out that Singapore was a small country with a need to industrialize and that it was therefore important that young persons acquired the skills and the qualifications meeting the changing needs of the industries. He stated that no child labour existed in his country and requested more flexibility in the application of the Convention. He expressed appreciation of the results of the visit of the regional adviser on standards to Singapore last year. His country had taken the comments of this Committee very seriously. The Employment Act was currently under examination including the provisions which were the subject of the comments, comments which will be taken into consideration. If there would be no need to retain the provisions in question, then they would be eliminated from the law in due course.

The Workers' members considered that the oral information supplied by the Government and in particular its wish to have more flexibility in the application of the Convention seemed to be in contradiction with the indications contained in the comments of the Committee of Experts that the Commissioner for Labour had never granted any authorization and that the Government had repeatedly expressed its intention to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. This matter should be once again considered by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members considered that basically the Government requested to retain the limited exception from the Convention which it would not abuse. But unlike some Conventions, this Convention was drafted in very clear terms and really did not require any interpretation. The exceptions provided for in Articles 2 and 3 were very specific and gave no scope for leniency, deviation or flexibility. The Government should reconsider its position in the light of these obligations.

The Workers' member of Pakistan, noting the Government's considerations on the need to have an educational system giving proper qualifications to meet the future employment eventualities, stated that the requirements of the Convention should be respected. He stressed that both in the developed as well as the developing countries children should receive proper education and training instead of being sent to work. The Government should bring its law into conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative repeated that basically there was no child labour in his country, even if technically there was not total conformity with the Convention. The trade unions and the employers of his country shared this view. In some other countries, while the law prohibited child labour, it still existed in practice. The Government requested the necessary time to proceed with the examination of the provisions which would be deleted if considered unnecessary.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands asked the Government to provide information on the number of children under the age of 14 who were engaged as apprentices, as was requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative replied that he did not have such statistics which were within the competence of the Ministry of Education, but he believed that this information had already been sent to the ILO. If not, he would supply it upon his return. He indicated that the educational system in Singapore was such that most children below the age of 15 were still in school.

The Committee took note of the statement made by the Government representative. While noting the non-application in practice of the relevant regulation, the Committee reiterated its concern and hoped that the Government would revise the applicable legislation which, even if not applied in practice, was in contradiction with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would soon communicate information on the measures adopted in order to achieve the necessary harmonization.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

Chad (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that her Government had faced many crises over the past decades characterized by the drop in purchasing power of workers and the loss of many rights including freedom of association. In order to extricate the country from this permanent crisis which prevented any development the people of Chad had accepted to commence discussions to resolve these problems. The National Sovereign Conference had reached certain bitter conclusions, in particular those relating to the non-observance of international labour standards. That Sovereign Conference had requested the transitional government to do its utmost so as to guarantee respect for its international obligations. In order to rectify the errors committed by previous governments and taking into account current economic problems, this Government undertook to negotiate a social pact with the social partners. To this end initial contacts had taken place at the beginning of May 1993. The transitional government aimed at guaranteeing a satisfactory standard of living to all workers and their families and as such it had contacted the Workers' representatives to discuss the modalities of fixing wages. The Government accepted the legitimate comments made by the Committee of Experts. It however recalled the problems it faced in bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention and sought the technical assistance of the ILO in this respect.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the new information provided which the Committee of Experts would examine in detail. They noted the decision of the National Sovereign Conference according to which the Government should respect its international obligations, accept the comments of the Committee of Experts and maintain its intention to negotiate a social pact. The Workers' members stressed the importance of this undertaking in view of the fact that the level of the minimum wage in the country had not been upgraded since 1978. They firmly supported the views of the Committee of Experts that minimum wages were an important element of the fight against poverty particularly in the context of the current structural adjustment. They fully agreed with the request of the Committee of Experts for the Government to indicate any developments in the matter and to communicate information on the participation of concerned employers and workers in decisions regarding minimum wage fixing. They emphasized that mere announcement of decisions taken did not constitute real consultations, which constituted a prerequisite for all successful structural adjustments as well as the resolution of all problems relating to trade union rights.

The Employers' members also noted that for a long time minimum wages had not been revised which, in their view, was a violation of the Convention. They acknowledged that the economic problems and extreme poverty of the country were the causes of this situation. Even if the Government representative attributed the situation to errors committed by previous governments, the current situation continued to be very serious. They further emphasized the fact that the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank provided important assistance to countries like Chad, even if their demands and recommendations were often difficult to implement. The Employers' members expressed the hope that minimum wage fixing would not be destroyed by galloping inflation in view of the stated intention of the Government to rectify this situation. They considered that any solution should be the result of a consensus which was the only way of arriving at a social pact and improvements regarding the implementation of the Convention.

The Government representative noted with interest the statements made by the Workers' and Employers' members and added that the employers in her country were prepared to fix minimum wages and that agreement in this respect had been reached in tripartite meetings that had taken place in May 1993.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government, of the difficulties facing it, as well as of its firm intention to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention using the technical assistance of the ILO. The Committee wanted to trust that the Government would supply information in its next report on the concrete progress made in this regard which was of fundamental importance to the workers. The Committee emphasized the importance of the employers' and workers' participation in minimum wage fixing, including with a view to ensuring the success of the structural adjustment programme.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Brazil (ratification: 1965). A Government representative, the Secretary of Labour Relations of the Federal Government, stated that the problems relating to Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 constituted priorities for the Government. He also stated that the ILO's International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) was very important for his country in that it permitted it to deal with the problem of child labour which constituted a basic concern of the Government. After recalling the context in which the current Government was formed, he stated that the new Minister of Labour, who had a long experience in the trade union movement, would deal seriously with the questions regarding these Conventions. As was clear from the documents submitted to this Committee, in all the cases in which forced labour was alleged, including those transmitted to it through the ILO, had been investigated and had resulted in a number of police inquiries and inquiries by the Attorney-General for Labour Matters, including the imprisonment of some employers. With regard to the complaint made by the National Confederation of Agricultural Workers (CONTAG) relating to the Medasa distillery, the Government representative had given a number of indications of the measures taken by the authorities and had stated that the military police of the State of Bahia had not uncovered the existence of forced labour and that the labour inspectorate had only revealed the non-implementation of the laws regarding safety and health at work, lack of hygiene at the workplace or the absence of a register of workers. The activities of the labour inspection service had, however, contributed to the improvement of conditions of work. It was important to stress that in the 44 cases of complaints of forced labour lodged against enterprises, labour inspectors had not been able to detect such forced labour on arrival at the sites. This did not, however, mean that such practices did not exist in the country because complaints might possibly result in a change in the conditions of work that the labour inspectors noted in due course. Twenty-seven additional vehicles had been bought in order to strengthen the effectiveness of the labour inspection service and an additional ten helicopters had also been purchased to strengthen supervision activities. The enormous size of the country (8,500,000 km2) and the dispersal of the population throughout the northern and north-eastern regions (6 per cent of the population in 65 per cent of the national territory) should not be forgotten. As was also clear from the documentation presented to this Committee, determined action was undertaken with regard to the labour inspection service in cooperation with the Public Ministry of Labour and the support of the federal police and that of the police of the state Governments, in order to intensify the monitoring of the implementation of the law. In states like Espirito Santo, measures taken by the Ministry of Labour to implement the law had resulted in reactions followed by threats of violence made by rural employers. Coercive action by the State was not sufficient to apply the law and put a stop to such allegations. For an effective solution, the society as a whole and workers and employers in particular should be involved in this action. The first meeting of the National Committee on Labour had recently taken place following discussions between the major social partners. Workers, employers and other groups were represented in this committee. One of the subcommittees would have the specific task of the elimination of forced labour in Brazil and the elaboration of approaches to this question. The former programme for the elimination of forced labour had been changed to a project of the subcommittee of the National Committee on Labour in which, in addition to the Government, the society as a whole (trade unions, employers' organizations, National Foundation of Bishops, CONTAG, etc.) participated. Trade unions could present allegations of cases of forced labour and of inhuman conditions of work. Employers' associations would also have specific functions with regard to the very few employers who imposed this type of work and working conditions. The new policy of the Ministry of Labour was currently being applied in different provinces, where very interesting experiments were being observed such as the one developed by the Chamber of Inspection and Promotion of Rural Labour of Minas Gerais. In addition to the increase and upgrading of technical equipment, a process of modernization of the labour inspection service had begun, and a training programme for inspectors had been set up which, in a period of one-and-a-half years, would train 3,200 inspectors. An ILO official recently undertook a mission to Brazil to develop and improve the rural labour inspection service and the terms of a technical cooperation agreement in this area were discussed. The deepest causes that led workers to expose themselves to such inhuman conditions of work were to be found in the poverty affecting more than 30 million people in the country where most lived in rural areas. The objectives of the Government were the reduction of the rate of inflation which was more than 100 per cent a year, and the fight against poverty. The Government, therefore had to stimulate economic growth and the creation of employment. The Minister of Labour would have discussions with the Director-General of the ILO in July 1993 regarding possible technical assistance by the Office. As a result of the ongoing process and with international technical cooperation, Brazil could succeed in eliminating forced labour.

The Workers' members noted that for a number of years the report of the Committee of Experts had contained comments concerning the implementation of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105, and that this Committee had widely discussed this case in 1992. The Workers' members and the Employers' members had at the time drawn the attention of the Government to the seriousness of the problems and had expressed their dissatisfaction at the Government's replies and had further insisted that this case be examined this year. In 1992 the Government representative had denied the existence of forced labour despite a great deal of information to the contrary. This Committee had then noted the absence of political will on the part of the Government to eradicate this problem, in particular in view of the recent ILO reports indicating high incidences of forced labour among the young (about 7 million children). This year the Committee of Experts had noted the detailed information provided by the Government. The Workers' members considered this to be a constructive development compared to the attitude of the Government last year. The Committee of Experts had also noted the measures already taken by the Government (penal prosecutions, labour inspection and the PERFOR programme to eliminate forced labour and hiring on the basis of false promises). These measures confirmed what the Government representative had stated this year. The Workers' members, however, considered that this information could be supplemented as the Government had expressed its intention to follow up all the cases of forced labour reported to it. They underlined the importance of making serious efforts in the field and drew the attention of this Committee to the information supplied by the Association of Labour Inspectors of Brazil (AGITRA) according to which forced labour had greatly increased while the number of labour inspections conducted had fallen. According to this same information, the successive changes made in the Ministry of Labour had resulted in the discontinuance of programmes, including the rural labour inspection programme. The Workers' members considered this information to be disturbing as the complaints made proved that, in practice, forced labour and child labour were widely practised. Although some progress could be noted even though it was insufficient, forced labour still required the implementation of an overall policy that involved the participation of the entire population, of all the political authorities concerned, and the social partners. In this respect, the Workers' members were of the view that structural measures were needed in particular with regard to a more systematic monitoring of labour legislation, the imposition of sanctions and a wider coverage of minimum wages and the implementation of a more equitable fiscal policy which would permit the funding of an information and education policy. They hoped that the Committee, in its conclusions, would emphasize the importance of more detailed information on the real impact of the PERFOR programme as well as on the measures referred to by the Committee of Experts. The Committee should also stress the coordinating and effective measures that needed to be taken and the importance of concrete programmes not only in the educational field but also with regard to minimum wages. These two areas constituted fundamental ways of fighting poverty. Such widening of the approach to fighting forced labour was, in the view of the Workers' members, indispensable. They expressed the hope that they would be able to note the real progress made in this case next year, particularly following the positive change of attitude of the Government this year and in view of the fact that 1994 would be the year for reporting on Convention No. 29.

The Employers' members shared the assessment of the situation made by the Workers' members. They particularly welcomed the detailed statement made by the Government representative which, contrary to last year, acknowledged the existence of such problems. This undoubtedly showed the commitment of the Government to this question. The Employers' members wanted to refer specifically to the problem of debt bondage. The persons concerned were often obliged to travel far to obtain work, were paid salaries that did not enable them to reimburse their debts and had insufficient funds to return home. In this respect, the Government had acknowledged the existence of a serious problem and indicated that there were prosecutions under the Penal Code in this respect. While welcoming the measures taken by the Government, the Employers' members considered this to be the tip of the iceberg and that much remained to be done. They also considered that the Government should communicate to the Committee of Experts more detailed information concerning the PERFOR programme, its successes, reasons for any failures and other problems faced. Given the fact that the Experts had noted the discontinuance of some programmes, they urged the Government to correct the situation in a more systematic way. In this respect, it was encouraging to note that the Government had established a tripartite committee to fight forced labour. Even though such tripartite meetings constituted a positive approach, it was vital that the decisions taken by them be implemented rapidly. With regard to child labour, it was true Brazil had adopted a set of laws prohibiting such practice. The problem remained the implementation of this legislation and the Government had acknowledged the need for effective labour inspection in this vital area. They acknowledged the measures taken by the Government to improve the effectiveness of labour inspection and hoped that the Government would continue to improve further its effectiveness and take all other necessary measures in the very near future to implement these two Conventions.

The Workers' member of Brazil stated that her country was faced with many serious problems, aggravated by the current economic crisis. This situation resulted in forced labour and child labour, further complicated by the lack of schools and the absence of attention paid to children. In the last few months efforts had been made by the Government in this regard with the participation of the trade union movement and the technical assistance of national and international organizations including the ILO. Inspection visits and control measures taken had enabled positive changes to be seen. The State played an important role in controlling and implementing labour standards and it should increase its human resources and equipment so as to control effectively such practices. Finally, she indicated that employers should make efforts including through campaigns to inform themselves so as not to indulge in forced labour.

The Government member of the United States joined previous speakers in welcoming the much more cooperative and constructive attitude of the Government, as well as the efforts it was making to eradicate this very long-standing and prevalent problem of forced labour in the country. Based on her reading of the Committee of Experts' report what was needed was a more rigorous inspection throughout the country, effective and strictly applied sanctions and improved working conditions. She pointed out the further need for a widespread programme of education, to be carried out with the assistance of workers' and employers' organizations in order to raise social consciousness about and give wider publicity to the victims and the offenders in this respect which, in her view, was necessary for a comprehensive attack on both forced labour and child labour. She stated that there were many cases where landowners were not even aware that forced labour was taking place on their property. She acknowledged the Government's statement which stressed the need for a change of mentality and behaviour by all elements of society and she hoped to see positive results in the next report of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of New Zealand agreed with the statement made by the Workers' members regarding this very serious case. He shared their concern about the disparity between the law and the assurances given by the Government representative, on the one hand, and the other information, in particular the detailed report of the labour inspectors and of the Workers' members of Brazil, on the other. He acknowledged the Government's statement of good intentions and its recognition of the need for not only a more effective enforcement programme but also for an educational promotion programme as suggested by the Workers' members and the Government member of the United States. He felt that employers had to accept greater responsibility for ensuring that there was a widespread understanding that these practices constituted infringements of international standards and were unacceptable. He further drew the Committee's attention to paragraph 111 of the Committee of Experts' report regarding the need to maintain effective sanctions and, in particular, monetary penalties in countries having high rates of inflation.

The Workers' member of Colombia considered the situation to be dramatic and that close to the dawn of the twenty-first century, millions of workers, including children, still worked in conditions of slavery. This situation which was spreading throughout Latin America and other developing countries existed in Brazil and was recognized by the Government representative who had stressed the goodwill of the new Government. In his view it was indispensable to spell out the measures that Brazil would take to fight forced labour effectively. However, it was necessary to begin the process of social transformation through the distribution of national wealth in order to make effective progress in this domain. Finally, he referred to the complaint made to the Governing Body by the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT), including the relevant evidence provided regarding work under conditions of slavery in Brazil, but stated that no information had been received regarding the follow-up of this complaint.

The Government member of Germany also noted the cooperative attitude of the Brazilian Government in contrast to that of last year. This Committee was justified in thinking that the current Government had the intention of correcting the situation. He acknowledged the fact that the Government was facing considerable difficulties in its task, and welcomed the consensus among all groups on this question on which the Government seemed to base its action. He emphasized the fact that Brazil was one of the six target countries in the first phase of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC Programme and that cooperation with the Government was satisfactory.

The Workers' member of Italy stated that when he first learnt of this case last year he had been shocked by the gravity of the problem, which affected millions of children subjected to forced labour. He emphasized that one could not accept the fact that a country of Brazil's international importance should face a problem of this nature. In light of the information provided to this Committee, the Government now should adopt a cooperative attitude in order to attain concrete results through increases in resources, initiatives and the number of inspectors and thus eliminate as soon as possible this serious problem.

The Workers' member of Argentina supported the statements made by the Workers' members and indicated that within the framework of MERCOSUR a committee on labour matters had decided that the four countries involved in the integration process should ratify a number of ILO Conventions including Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 and that integration should be attained by 31 December 1994. This integration could be effective before such date if Brazil did not eliminate forced labour. The Coordinator of the Union of the four MERCOSUR countries would do her best to eliminate this plague. He wondered whether, with the support of the central trade unions and with the efforts of the Government, Brazil could perhaps bring a different message next year.

The Employers' member of Brazil stated that her organization, the National Confederation of Industry, had offered to participate in the PERFOR programme as this programme did not provide for the participation of employers' organizations.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands considered that this Committee should welcome the positive changes in the attitude of the Government without unduly exaggerating such changes. It was now necessary to note results before expressing any further satisfaction. The conclusions of this Committee should, while welcoming the attitude of the Government, state the need to wait for the examination of the Government's report by the Committee of Experts before coming to any conclusions on this case. He also agreed with previous speakers who had emphasized the need for the Government to include organizations of workers and employers in the search for solutions to the problems and hoped that this point would be included in the conclusions of this Committee.

The Government representative thanked the speakers who had taken part in the discussions. In reply to the Workers' members, he stated that workers' and employers' organizations, among other interested parties, were involved in the transformation of the PERFOR programme. The elimination of the practices and conditions of work described above was not possible unless the social partners altered their attitudes. He submitted to this Committee a great deal of documentation regarding the practical effects of the new attitude and policy of the Ministry of Labour and of the Government, including the vigorous work done by the labour inspectorate. A national committee on labour had been established with a view to solving on a global level the problems of forced labour and this committee would hold its first national meeting on labour matters soon. He also referred to training programmes involving 3,000 labour inspectors. His Government intended to involve society at large, including workers' and employers' organizations, in resolving these problems and in the supervision of the implementation of legal standards. It was necessary to implement profound structural transformations, and, to this end, specific programmes for development and growth of the standard of living of rural areas was in the process of being prepared in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations. The Government's next report would contain information on the results of the important and effective measures taken.

The Committee welcomed the information provided by the Government representative, in particular its ongoing activities in this area undertaken with the assistance of the ILO's IPEC programme. It also took note with interest of the PERFOR programme in which representatives of workers' and employers' apparently participate along with other groups. The Committee further noted that the labour inspectorate had not uncovered any cases of forced labour but that the Government intended, with the assistance of the ILO, to strengthen this service. The Committee was pleased to note the cooperative attitude now shown by the Government. The Committee noted with concern, however, that the allegations examined by the Committee of Experts were submitted by AGITRA, labour inspectors and by Latin American and international workers' organizations. These allegations concerned forced labour of thousands of workers under inhuman conditions, involving violence which could result in death, hiring on the basis of false promises, debt bondage and child labour. These constituted very serious violations of basic provisions of this Convention. The Committee considered that comprehensive measures, including education and a campaign against poverty that permitted an increase in public awareness of the situation, were required. The Committee hoped that the Government would intensify its efforts to ensure continuity of the programmes established in order to eradicate forced labour throughout the national territory. It also hoped the Government would strengthen the system of labour inspection, in particular rural labour inspection, by providing sufficient equipment and human resources, by involving the entire society and by effectively using all law enforcement powers of the State to fight this plague through the strict application of the sanctions provided for by the national Constitution and the Labour Code. The Committee trusted that the Government would communicate detailed information regarding the real results of this new policy so as to allow it to record significant progress made in resolving these very serious problems.

The Government representative requested that the conclusions of the Committee should not include any reference to the allegations made by AGITRA and the workers' organizations, in view of the fact that the Government had taken measures in this respect and had implemented the law.

The Chairman of the Committee pointed out that such references were made during the discussions that had taken place, thus justifying their inclusion in the conclusions.

Cuba (ratification: 1953). The Government supplied the following information:

At the request of the Committee of Experts, the Government submitted resolution No. 1 of 5 January 1993 passed by the Minister, President of the State Labour and Social Security Committee after having consulted trade union organizations throughout the country. This resolution repealed resolution No. 590 of 1980, which had been the subject of an observation by the Committee of Experts. It emphasized that resolution No. 1, in addition to repealing the previous resolution, provided improved details on this matter, removing from the labour records the lists of merits and demerits of workers that were recorded in accordance with repealed resolution No. 590 of 1980.

It also recalled that in the written information presented by the Government at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference there was included as an appendix the text of section 82 of the Draft Regulation on Employment Policy, with an example of the new form of labour record setting out its current content, in which it was stressed that the list of merits and demerits instituted by the repealed resolution No. 590 of 1980 was not a part of such record.

With regard to the penultimate paragraph of the observation of the Committee of Experts, the criteria already stated were repeated with regard to the non-existence in the country of any form of forced labour within the terms of the Convention. The work day was clearly limited under the Labour Code. No worker was forced, either by the legislation or in daily practice, to work beyond the work day established in his workplace, nor was any type of pressure exerted on workers to carry out voluntary labour. The rights of workers were established in the labour legislation with the guarantees that were necessary for them to be exercised, without the conditions invoked by some worker or employer members with regard to voluntary labour.

In addition, a Government representative stated that she did not understand why the Committee of Experts had reiterated the observations made in 1991 on the basis of the evidence of poor credibility provided by the biased persons who were not really concerned with human rights. The Government had already submitted oral and written replies and five investigations had been carried out on the different cases in Cuba. Without presenting any new elements it was declared that the consideration of this case should continue on the basis of resolution No. 590 of 1980 and the allegations that Cuban workers were under pressure to exercise voluntary labour. In its written replies submitted to the ILO, the Government indicated that resoluton No. 590 of 1980, which referred to the lists of merits and demerits, had been repealed by resolution No. 1 of 1993, a copy of which had been provided. This amounted to more than a formal repeal because the lists of merits and demerits would be taken out of the labour records of workers. This demonstrated the Government's engagement to eliminate from the labour legislation any ambiguous provision which could be misinterpreted and exploited for political purposes. The Labour Code laid down very precise conditions as to the working day, leisure time, vacations, in conformity with ratified Conventions. The workers were not subjected to any form of pressure.

The Workers' members, recalling the discussion in this Committee in 1992 and the requests formulated by the Committee of Experts, took note of the oral and written information supplied by the Government. The repeal of resolution No. 590 of 1980 constituted a first step to ensure that there was no implicit pressure on the workers to accept voluntary labour. It was therefore appropriate to follow developments in the situation, as was in fact requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the declaration of the Workers' members. As the system of merits and demerits existed in Cuba for some time, it may in fact be systemic even without the resolution No. 590 of 1980. Some follow-up was required here to determine whether in fact the repeal of this resolution was really meaningful. The Government should provide information as to what was being done to assure that employers were not keeping informal records that would relate to transfers and promotions and other benefits due to workers.

The Workers' member of the United States, joining with the statements of the Workers' and the Employers' members, declared that the repeal of resolution No. 590 of 1980 was but a first step. The question was to know whether, beyond the formal action taken, there existed some underlying systemic problems. Certain rights, privileges and advantages, whether or not job related, were assigned by the degree to which a worker was willing to do compulsory, unpaid overtime work. The official sources indicated that an impressive number of workers had worked overtime. The Government asserted that no worker was punished, harassed or deprived of any right for failure to volunteer and confirmed the changes in law. The change in practice was needed on a par with the changes in law and the Government should provide information required to confirm its intention to respect the Convention.

The Workers' member of Cuba declared that Cuban workers had accepted the repeal of resolution No. 590 of 1980 and the elimination of the list of merits and demerits from the labour records. The voluntary labour was eminently voluntary in nature which had its origin in the social conscience and in the spirit of solidarity of the workers' collective who voluntarily undertook to contribute to the construction of social works for the benefit of the workers themselves. This voluntary work, which contributed to the solution of social problems, was supported by the unions and did not include any aspect of coercion.

The Government representative recalled that provisions concerning the working day, overtime and the workers' rights were contained in the Labour Code and workers could have recourse to the tribunals against violation of their rights. The decision to repeal the resolution was based on the fact that the administration had no interest in supervising, directing or organizing any type of work which was over and beyond the standard working hours approved by the workers in each centre of work in accordance with the Labour Code. The files containing merits and demerits had not been utilized as an indirect form of pressure on the workers or for the acquisition of consumer goods. She expressed the hope that, with the repeal of the resolution, the Committee of Experts would close this matter which certain persons had misused for propagandistic and political purposes. A union recognised as trade union activity those workers who had demonstrated an attitude of solidarity, without this having any other significance.

The Workers' member of Paraguay, referring to the declarations that the work was essentially voluntary and did not contain any element of coercion, estimated that the situation should be studied in a profound manner and that the ILO should, with the agreement of the Government, carry out an investigation in the field to verify the validity of these allegations. It would not be justified to close the case without the necessary guarantees and legal and practical elements and without verifying the existence of a violation of the will of the Cuban workers to undertake this so called voluntary labour.

The Employers' member of Cuba stated that the voluntary labour was indeed voluntary and was carried out in dignity. It was carried out by the workers themselves in order to resolve their problems of housing, health and education.

The Committee took note of the oral and written information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion on the issues raised in the report of the Committee of Experts on voluntary labour. The Committee noted that the adoption of resolution No. 1 of 5 January 1993 which repealed resolution No. 590 of 11 December 1980 and provided for the elimination of the lists of merits and demerits of workers from the labour records was an important step in the solution of the problem in question. The Committee hoped that this first step would be followed in practice by new progress that would contribute to the complete elimination of any form of coercion involved in voluntary labour and that the Government would provide detailed information in this regard.

India (ratification: 1954). A Government representative stated that a high level of awareness already existed in India about the problem of bonded labour and the Government was making every possible effort to eradicate it. He recalled that two centuries of continuous and perpetual economic exploitation had made India a land of poverty and famine. The awakening against this bondage had only occurred quite recently, after independence. The country had conquered the famine and it was only a question of time before it also conquered the bondage. He was confident that as his country's economic strength increased, debt bondage would disappear. The will of the Government and of the people to eradicate this problem could be seen in the existence of legislative provisions banning debt bondage, the effective follow-up to executive action, judicial remedies, the discussion in Parliament and in state legislatures, the adequate publicity given by the media, and the voluntary agencies active in this field. He recalled that comprehensive legislation had been adopted in 1976 through the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act which extinguished the liabilities of bonded labourers and made offences punishable. Bonded labour was not only prohibited by the Constitution and specific legislation, but was also combated administratively by the executive apparatus of both the central and state Governments. Administrative action consisted of three stages: identification, release and rehabilitation. The central Government continued to advise the state Governments to conduct periodic surveys for the identification of bonded labourers and to take steps for their release and rehabilitation. They have also been advised to involve voluntary agencies and social action groups in this task. Identification and release of bonded labourers were not sufficient however. The Government, therefore, provided three types of rehabilitation grants: land-based, non-land-based and skill-craft-based. Furthermore, vigilance committees had been set up in districts and subdivisions of states in order to enforce properly the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act. These committees periodically reviewed their work which was, in turn, also monitored. The Government would approach the ILO in the near future in order to improve this monitoring mechanism. He indicated that 256,000 bonded labourers had been identified and 233,000 had been rehabilitated. It was, therefore, not appropriate to conclude that there was no effective enforcement of the Act. Criminal prosecution had to be based on due process of law and could not be done within artificially set time-limits. The National Commission on Rural Labour submitted its report in July 1991 and the recommendations were forwarded to the ministries and departments of the central Government for examination in consultation with state Governments. State Governments were also provided with copies for examination and implementation. The progress was reviewed periodically. He noted that a meeting had been held by the Union Minister of State for Labour with the labour secretaries from the states where the problem of bonded labour was endemic. It was concluded that a new survey of labour should be carried out in those states. The states should endeavour to complete the surveys by September 1993. A Committee of State Labour Secretaries was constituted to recommend a workable definition of bonded labour to be used for the survey, taking into account the judicial pronouncements in this regard. To ensure the release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers, states had been advised to integrate the various anti-poverty schemes (e.g. the Integrated Rural Development Programme and Jawahar Rozgar Yojna). In the activities undertaken under the special component plans for SC/ST, arrangements existed for the allotment of surplus land to the free bonded labourers. Assistance was also provided in the form of non-land assets and the Act provided for restoration of the property of bonded labourers after their release, free from encumbrances. Vigilance committees and voluntary agencies were involved in the identification and rehabilitation of bonded labourers. The involvement of trade unions in this process might prove to be unworkable as they were in the organized sector and most bonded labourers were found in the unorganized sector. Furthermore, it would be difficult for freed bonded labourers to organize themselves into a voluntary agency for the implementation of rehabilitation schemes as they preferred to settle in their own villages and were scattered all over the country.

As concerned the proposed Commission on Human Rights, the Government did not need to entrust any specific subjects to it as the proposed Commission would have the freedom to go into any issue which, in its opinion, infringed human rights.

With respect to the question of child labour, he stated that nine national child labour projects, including a major component on special schools, had been set up under the Action Plan to implement the National Child Labour Policy of 1987. In 1993, the National Child Labour Advisory Board had identified two national projects for the complete elimination of child labour in one year. Referring to the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), he indicated that the Government had signed a Memorandum of Understanding with the ILO in May 1992. Fifty-six projects had been approved by the tripartite National Steering Committee, 34 of which were already being implemented. One of the largest projects was for the training of inspectors which would be carried out at the National Labour Institute and four Regional Labour Training Institutes during 1993 and would cover about 600 inspectors.

As concerned the amendments which the Committee of Experts had requested be made to the Nagaland (Requisition of Porters) Act, 1965, he pointed out that, since the recent Assembly elections in Nagaland, the matter had been taken up once again, on a priority basis, at the highest level with the Chief Minister of the Government of Nagaland.

Finally, with respect to the statistical data requested by the Committee of Experts, he indicated that data on the discharge of personnel in the Navy was now available, but data concerning the Army was difficult to collect. The Defence Services Regulations requested could not be provided to the ILO as these were meant only for official use.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the detailed information provided and recalled that this case had been discussed in this Committee for a number of years. The problem was an enormous one. Bonded labour had existed traditionally in India and was prohibited by legislation 15 years ago. The very old system of bonded labour was, however, difficult to eradicate in practice. In this regard, they recalled that the Committee of Experts indicated in its comments that no significant improvement had been made in the situation. They pointed out that the discrepancy between the estimates of the number of bonded labourers was tremendous. Figures varied from 250,000 to 5,000,000. The individual states were better placed to make these estimates than the national Government, but this division of responsibilities did not seem to be very successful. This was also a problem with respect to the vigilance committees. The Government did not receive any reports from these committees and it appeared that they might not be functioning properly. If this was true, measures needed to be taken. While voluntary agencies were active in the rehabilitation and reintegration into society of former bonded labourers, the reports of the National Commission on Rural Labour indicated that there had been little success in rehabilitation and that measures had to be taken to improve the situation. They noted the Committee of Experts' call for more voluntary agencies to be involved in rehabilitation activities and requested the Government to indicate whether new agencies did exist and what their impact was. They noted that the Government, while indicating its preparedness to observe the developments in the situation, had rejected the idea of creating a national committee to deal with bonded labour. They noted that there was a Bill to establish a Commission on Human Rights, but were not clear as to whether this Commission would be responsible for the question of bonded labour. They queried the Government as to the powers of this Commission and recalled that bonded labour could only be effectively combated when the necessary action was planned and implemented.

As concerned child bonded labour, they noted the information provided by the Government representative concerning the creation of two national programmes. If these programmes had actually been already set up, how were they being implemented in practice? According to a United Nations document, a very large number of children were affected by bonded labour. They requested the Government to provide further information to the Office on the results of the fact-finding committee appointed by the Supreme Court. Child labour was a sign of a high degree of poverty in a country. This problem was not restricted to India, as could be seen by the convening of the Asian Regional Seminar on Children in Bondage. This particular case, however, was a question of ensuring in practice what had already been provided in legislation. The measures already taken were not satisfactory and needed to be strengthened. Stronger measures should come at the federal level, and if this was not possible with the present division of responsibility, then perhaps the division should be reviewed. Despite the Government representative's assurances that the problem would be dealt with, very little progress could be noted up to now. They requested the Government to provide detailed information to the Office on any changes made (which were so urgently required) so as to ensure the eradication of bonded labour in practice.

The Workers' members noted that this was one of the most difficult and intractable problems which this Committee had to discuss this year. They noted that the Government had not supplied a report in 1992 and 1993 for examination by the Committee of Experts and stressed that this information was essential to the adequate handling of this case by the Committee of Experts and this Committee. They lamented the lack of progress made since the adoption of legislation to abolish bonded labour and the landmark Supreme Court decision. The process of identification of bonded labourers was slow, the rehabilitation measures were inadequate, the constitution and functioning of vigilance committees fell far short of what was required, the involvement of voluntary agencies in official rehabilitation schemes was almost non-existent, prosecutions were few and the penalties imposed were ludicrous. It was true that legislation for the abolition of bonded labour existed, but the magnitude of the problem had to be established before effective policies to tackle it could be adopted. As the Employers' members had indicated, the estimates of the number of bonded labourers varied extraordinarily. They had doubts about the latest figures provided by the Government which indicated that there were only 30,000 bonded labourers left. While the Government indicated that they were undertaking new surveys to determine the number of bonded labourers, the Workers' members recalled that the Government had been saying this since 1985, still without results. In its report, the National Commission on Rural Labour had indicated that the definition of bonded labour adopted by the National Sample Survey Organization doing the statistical investigation was far too restricted. The Committee of Experts had expressed the hope that the Government would take into consideration the full definition of bonded labour in any instructions issued. The Workers' members noted, however, that the human resources available in India should have been sufficient to undertake more adequately a sound statistical investigation. As concerned the vigilance committees, the National Commission on Rural Labour had indicated that most of these committees had not been constituted and those which had been set up were inactive. Monitoring of these committees' work was essential. They requested the Government to indicate the steps taken to monitor the vigilance committees. They queried what effective rehabilitation action could be taken when the areas where bonded labour was found were characterized by economic backwardness, poor infrastructure and low employment. They urged the Government to provide information to the Office for examination on the action taken to stimulate involvement of voluntary agencies in rehabilitation activities as recommended by the National Commission on Rural Labour.

While they welcomed the steps taken to adopt a Bill establishing a Commission on Human Rights, they noted that the major problem at present was bonded labour. It was not at all clear that the Commission on Human Rights was going to deal with this problem. As concerned the enforcement of sanctions, the Workers' members noted the references in the report of the National Commission on Rural Labour to inordinate time-lags between identification, release and rehabilitation and the lack of prosecutions for violation of the Act.

Referring to the tragedy of child labour in India, the Workers' members were dubious about the Government representative's statement that this would be eradicated within one year.

Finally, the Workers' members noted that it was impossible to ask all the questions which needed to be asked in the short time available. This case represented one of the most serious violations of this Convention and its application in India would have to be kept under constant and regular review. The efforts made by the Government were inadequate and the results dissatisfying. The case would have to be reviewed by the Committee in the future and they hoped that the Government would provide the Office with the reports necessary for proper examination. In the future, this case might require special treatment in order to express the dissatisfaction with the manner in which it was being handled.

The Workers' member of Pakistan stated his conviction that bonded labour, and particularly child labour, was an evil not only to India but to all humanity. In this context, he welcomed the creation of the National Commission on Rural Labour. Special measures were required in order to free bonded labourers who typically came from Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and were often illiterate and landless. The Government should pay special attention to this segment of society and facilitate their access to gainful employment. The anti-poverty schemes described by the Government should be more directed to this problem. He urged the Government to implement the recommendation of the National Commission on Rural Labour to establish a national authority or national commission on bonded labour. He also urged the Government to supply a copy of the Supreme Court judgement requested in the comments of the Committee of Experts. He welcomed the recommendations of the Asian Regional Seminar on Children in Bondage and hoped that the governments involved would, in the coming years, allocate resources for the education and training of children and provide gainful employment to the poor segments of society, particularly those involved in rural labour, so that the evil of bonded labour could be eradicated. Finally, he expressed the hope that the IPEC programme would help member States tackle this problem and strengthen the measures needed for the elimination of bonded labour.

The Workers' member of New Zealand, associating himself with the comments of the Workers' members, noted that the neutral and dispassionate language of the Committee of Experts could not hide the tragedy underlying this case. The report of the Asian Regional Seminar on Children in Bondage had referred to bonded children as the most lonely, vulnerable, tragic workers of the world. While the difficulties faced by the Government in trying to eradicate this evil were great, he requested the Government to indicate the measures taken in response to the recommendations made at the Asian Regional Seminar, particularly as concerned the creation of a comprehensive national policy and programme of action covering legislative reforms, effective enforcement and a system of compulsory and free education, sustained by community mobilization and information campaigns.

The Workers' member of Colombia pointed out that, while the Government had ratified the Convention 39 years ago, it was still at the stage of taking measures. Although the information provided was full of optimism, unfortunately the workers and particularly the children subjected to forced labour and slavery were not of the same opinion. This Committee was constantly being told by a majority of countries that studies were being made, that measures were being taken and that the Government would take appropriate action. The only thing one could note in practice, however, was the persistence of the problems. He stated that, unfortunately, this was a case which affected millions of victims. Yet again, one could see the profound social imbalance reigning over humanity. Naturally, the highest price was paid by the poorest and most marginalized sectors who saw not only their rights denied, but also their hopes. Finally, while he agreed that the Government of India should muster all its enthusiasm, patriotic fervour and sensitivities to solve this problem, he added that the industrialized countries and those countries with a higher economic capacity needed to revise their policies with a view to ensuring a fairer distribution of world income, as this would solve many of the problems arising in the world. It was necessary that all the forces in India concerned themselves not only with the most privileged, but rather principally with the poorest of their country.

The Government member of Germany, restricting his comments to child bonded labour, stated that there were certain signs of progress in this case. While agreeing that the overall situation was quite depressing, he recalled that India was one of the main target countries for the ILO's International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). As a member of the Steering Committee, he wished to point out that the Indian Government was making enormous efforts to deal with the problem of child bonded labour. A great deal of critical attention had been given to this problem by the Vice-President of India in his statement at the opening of the Conference on Safety and Health in New Delhi. While such self-criticism did not solve the problem, it was encouraging and the Government should be encouraged to continue along these lines so that the situation could finally change.

The Government representative, after indicating his gratitude for the views expressed, clarified that the one-year plan for the elimination of child labour was not intended to eradicate all child labour, but concerned two project areas identified for administrative and logistical convenience. As concerned the non-supply of reports, he stated that it was very difficult to obtain information relating to the vigilance committees. Already more than 400 vigilance committees existed and more would have to be created after the survey was completed. For this reason, the Government was approaching the ILO for technical cooperation in the field of monitoring. He concluded by indicating that the various comments made in this Committee would be taken into account and reiterated that his Government was very serious about addressing the problem of bonded labour and especially the problem of child labour.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee observed that more than 15 years had elapsed since the abolition in law of the bonded labour system in 1976. It noted, however, that, as was stated by the Committee of Experts, this serious situation had, since then, improved very little in practice: the process of identification was slow, rehabilitation measures were inadequate, the constitution and functioning of vigilance committees left much to be desired and were not monitored by a national body, the involvement of voluntary agencies in official rehabilitation schemes was not being encouraged, prosecutions were rare and penalties imposed even rarer. The Committee noted that the National Commission on Rural Labour in a report published in 1991 pointed to the shortcomings and made a number of proposals and recommendations. The Committee also recalled the comments of the Committee of Experts over recent years with regard to the very serious situation of bonded child labour, as well as the discussions that had taken place on this matter. It noted with interest the technical cooperation agreement concluded with the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour. The Committee expressed its deep concern and urged the Government to provide a detailed report, with all the necessary information, for examination by the Committee of Experts at its next session. In view of the seriousness of the situation and the slowness of the progress made since 1976, the Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to take this case up again next year and that it would be able to note substantial progress towards the elimination of bonded labour.

Peru (ratification: 1960). A Government representative referred separately to the three questions covered by the report of the Committee of Experts. First, concerning the indigenous communities in Atalaya, he stated that the administrative labour authority of Puno, on whose authority these communities administratively depended, had encountered difficulties in dealing with the workers' demands. In reply to this, the Multi-Sectoral Committee in charge of examining their situation had recommended the creation of the regional work zone and of the social promotion of Huaypetue. Moreover, a programme of inspection adapted to the informal sector was being elaborated. A general plan of reassessment of indigenous communities was currently under way, together with the indigenous communities Ashanincas and Shipibos, who had been obliged to leave their original territory. By the action in favour of the return of these communities to their area of origin and of the reassessment of their proper organization, the Government tried to eradicate the practices of bonded labour, the violent forms of recruiting the labour force and the conditions of forced labour. Concerning the unremunerated work by children in chestnut-peeling enterprises in Puerto Maldonado, the speaker stated that his Government had taken the most severe measures against those who, directly or indirectly, obliged minors to work without remuneration. According to the report of the National Bureau of Labour Relations of 20 May 1993, the presence of children in this activity was due to the custom that mothers of the family voluntarily take their children and spouses to perform the work when the payment is in proportion to the quantity of chestnuts peeled per day. Nevertheless, appropriate measures of dissuasion had been taken, including the supervision of the implementation of the Legislative Decree No. 728 and its regulations (Employment Act). As regards the clandestine establishments of recruitment ("enganche"), their closure had been possible in Cuzco, thanks to a campaign of inspection and sanction and to the legalization of small recruitment companies functioning in conformity with the requirements of the two legal texts mentioned above. The creation of the regional work zone and of the social promotion of Huaypetue would avoid the workers concerned being obligated to go as far as Madre de Dios, which should contribute to the solution of the problem. Finally, the national police, in virtue of Communication No. 201-92-DS-CUS of 13 November 1992, would be able to survey and control workers who migrated to Madre de Dios without a labour contract duly authorized by the Ministry of Labour.

The Employers' members first drew attention to the fact that most of the information noted by the Experts in their report had come from the Government itself. Regarding the indigenous communities in Atalaya, they wondered about the living conditions in the area where the Government wanted to send them back, especially in view of such facts as the utilization of criminal recruitment methods which also concerned children, who were sometimes kept in situations and conditions absolutely inhuman. They considered that the statement by the Government representative did not indicate any substantial improvement, and requested more detailed information to be supplied to the Experts. As to the work by children in chestnut-peeling, the Employers' members were aware of the serious conditions of poverty which caused the situation. However, such conditions should justify all the more the severe measures to be taken against this phenomenon, because it could not be eliminated by legislation alone. They requested the Government to specify the concrete measures envisaged. In the case of workers in the Madre de Dios gold-mines and washeries, the conditions of work were extremely hard and their improvement problematic because of the difficulties in enforcing criminal sanctions. Regarding the three situations considered by the Committee of Experts, the explanations given by the Government were very vague. The Employers' members therefore requested the Government to specify in the future the measures that had been effectively taken in practice and their impact. They requested clarification on the number of existing indigenous areas and the expected period of time for the return of the communities to their original place of residence.

The Workers' members entirely supported the statement of the Employers' members. They recalled that the problem under question had existed practically since the ratification of the Convention by Peru in 1960 and emphasized that it was not the question of legislation but rather of its enforcement. The impatience of both the Employers' and Workers' members was justified because of the seriousness of the problem, that is of slavery, of child labour and of exploitation of indigenous peoples. Concerning the unremunerated work by children, the Workers' members drew attention to the problem of sanctioning the responsible, since it was often the mothers themselves who often took their children to work. Nevertheless sanctions should be imposed on those who, without being related to the children, make children work without remuneration. They requested the Government to supply the final report of the Multi-Sectoral Committee established by the Ministerial Resolution of 26 June 1990 and to provide detailed reports to the Committee of Experts. Finally, they stressed the importance of adopting and applying appropriate sanctions, as highlighted by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 111 of its General Report.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that the international community and the members of the Committee, even less, should not remain impassive when faced with the serious problems of working children, youth and women in the gold-mines and washeries of Madre de Dios. He stated that, according to the denunciations presented by a journalist of Puerto Maldonado, common graves would be found in this area to bury the miners who were victims of diseases and accidents. The speaker mentioned the phenomenon called "ahijaditos" consisting of certain families handing over the parental authority to another family or persons who would play the role of employer in absolutely illegal conditions. As regards gold-mines of Madre de Dios, the Departmental Bureau of Statistics had established in 1984 that about 30,000 persons were employed and that this figure would rise during periods of rain and vacations, which led one to suspect the illegal recruitment of children and youth. The transport of workers in trucks from Cuzco to the place of work could last three days, meaning that sometimes the workers, on arrival at the destination, were sick and weakened to such a point that they could easily catch malaria. He submitted to the Committee a document containing all the information concerning the case under examination and concluded by requesting the Government to supply, at the next Conference, full and detailed information on the measures taken on this matter.

The Workers' member of Peru stated that the time that had passed since presentation of denunciations rendered them gradually inconsistent and less credible. Their extreme gravity required more rapid treatment; otherwise the conclusions or recommendations of the ILO bodies would arrive too late to have any effectiveness in the defence of the workers' rights. He therefore considered that it was absolutely necessary and urgent to change the methodology of the discussion and of the adoption of conclusions of this Committee.

The Government representative described the geographic area in which the phenomena mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts had taken place and recalled that in the past terrorists had settled there, abusing children and making them work, although this had now ended. His country was practically destroyed between 1985 and 1990 and was currently in the process of reconstruction. Concerning the zones which the Employers' members mentioned, he specified that there were 80 zones where 13,200 inhabitants were counted, as well as 205 commercial establishments, 166 cattle-raising stations, 2,700 farmers and 118 woodcutting establishments employing 1,400 persons. Other information and statistics would be submitted to the Committee. In addition, he again mentioned the creation of the regional zone recommended by the Multi-Sectoral Committee to which he had already referred. Furthermore, his country did not have, in the zone in question, qualified personnel to supervise the enforcement of labour standards. He therefore requested the ILO to continue to support the efforts to train inspectors.

The Committee took note of the statements by the Government representative, and took into account the fact that the information on which the Committee of Experts based its comments came from the reports of the Government. The Committee observed with concern that the serious problems mentioned by the Committee of Experts continued. In relation to the indigenous communities in Atalaya, the Committee noted that the recommendations formulated by the Multi-Sectoral Committee had not been implemented, despite the seriousness of the problems that were noted of debt servitude, the deprivation of liberty and constitutional rights, and the use of violence against workers of these communities. Nor had measures been taken to avoid children being indirectly obliged to work in conditions that could not be assimilated to a free employment relationship. As for the workers in the Madre de Dios gold-mines and washeries, the Committee hoped that the Government would submit, together with its next report, the final report of the Multi-Sectoral Committee established to examine the situation of these workers. The Committee urged the Government to take urgently the necessary measures to ensure full respect for the Convention, putting an end to the practices that were denounced and which constituted serious violations of the Convention and to provide detailed information in its next report. The Committee decided to discuss this case once again at its next session.

Sudan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative indicated that his Government had sent a report with detailed information concerning the allegations of cases of slavery and similar practices presented to the UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. He regretted that this report had not arrived on time to be examined by the Committee of Experts; another copy of this report had been given to the Office. He stated that the problems that had been raised were related to conflicts of a tribal nature, such as conflicts over water sources or pasturage. Such conflicts resulted in the taking of hostages and prisoners that one tribe or another could exchange for that which they had lost. He explained that, in such cases tradition and the advice of the wise man were resorted to in order to resolve such conflicts in an appropriate manner and in compliance with tradition and the relations between tribes. These conflicts were not considered in his country to be cases of slavery. He also indicated that the nature of the rules of customary law did not permit the establishment of precedents corresponding to those of an ordinary tribunal or court, which made it difficult to gather information. Nevertheless his Government was doing all that it could to supply the information. Finally, he stated that a committee responsible for investigating the allegations referred to had been formed, and had made several visits to the regions involved, without having noticed any evidence of the truth of the allegations.

The Workers' members noted that this was a very serious case which had been discussed by the Conference Committee in 1989 and 1992 and which was the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts in 1989, 1990, 1992 and 1993. All the points raised in the report of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities were very serious, in particular as they concerned the taking of slaves by Government troops, child bondage and sexual abuse. Observing that until 1992 the Government simply denied the existence of slavery, that it had previously never supplied reports and that today it stated that it had belatedly sent them to the secretariat, they noted that this country still had not requested the technical assistance of the ILO and that it was still impossible for international investigatory committees to make their way to the regions concerned. They found that the new Penal Code, which only punished slavery with a penalty of one year's imprisonment and a possible fine, and for which no information was available on its application, was merely a formal instrument. While specifying that any opinion that the Workers' member of Sudan expressed in support of the position of the Government of his country did not in any way reflect the general position of the Workers' members, they proposed that the continued failure to implement the Convention, the lack of cooperation from the Government and the seriousness of the allegations be highlighted in the conclusions. They also proposed to place the conclusions in the special paragraph concerning continued failure to implement.

The Employers' members noted that no report had been received despite requests by the Committee of Experts, and that the case had been heard by this Committee in 1989 and 1992. In the past, the Government had essentially disputed all allegations and had considered that it was not obliged to provide detailed information because there was a law in effect prohibiting slavery and because no cases on this matter had been before the courts. Consequently, there was no opportunity to examine the situation, and visitors from international organizations were not given the opportunity to carry out investigations in the country itself. On the other hand, before this Committee the Government representative now admitted the existence of some of the alleged activities but explained that they were part of tribal traditions and were to be accepted as such. The Employers' members stressed that Sudan was a member of an international community recognizing the rule of law. To the extent that Sudan had ratified the Convention, it was obliged to fulfil the ensuing obligations. It could not present the law of the jungle as acceptable law in respect of tribal populations either under this Convention. They emphasized that the primary responsibility of every State was to provide protection for all of its citizens, and for this reason they could not accept the Government's explanations as a partial excuse. In view of the previous special paragraph, and the subsequent deterioration rather than improvement of the situation, they stated that this Committee should take note in its conclusions of the continuing failure to fulfil the obligations of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Sudan regretted that the information sent by the Government had arrived late and that it could not be examined by the Committee of Experts. He hoped that this would not recur in the future so that the Experts could appreciate the true dimensions of the problems, which did not have any relation to the application of the Convention. He referred to the different reforms undertaken with regard to legislation and the establishment of a council responsible for dealing with problems resulting from structural adjustment. He hoped that this would all result in a genuine social contract to which all workers aspired.

The Workers' member of Kuwait, while supporting the opinion expressed by the spokesman of the Workers' members, added that it was appropriate to question the motives for the delay in the sending of the reports by governments. He regretted that the Government had rejected the allegations made in the UN report as it did not seem to provide all the guarantees with regard to democracy and freedom of association. He asked that a special paragraph of the report be set aside for the situation in Sudan.

Another Government representative of Sudan recalled the instructions concerning the sending of the reports, the characteristics of the current situation in these regions of his country and the negative conclusions of the committee set up to investigate the allegations. He recognized that the conflicts between tribes had increased as a result of drought and desertification but they found a solution in mutual consensus through conciliation conferences headed by wise men and tribal chiefs. (Those councils operated according to the ordinary law which came under the jurisdiction of the Sudanese judicial system.) He stressed that his country had a genuine tradition and a real civilization, and it was prepared to respect its international commitments. With regard to the intervention of the Worker member of Kuwait, he indicated that a trade union law had been adopted and that free trade union elections had been carried out. In this context, he was presenting the rule of law for this specified situation and not otherwise. As to the supply of precedents to the Committee of Experts, the Attorney General had advised that no case of this nature existed as shown from the records of the ordinary courts. Traditionally, the verdicts issued by the tribal conciliation councils were considered to be of judicial power and enforceable as was the case in the ordinary courts. Finally, he affirmed the Sudanese Government's readiness to cooperate with the Committee of Experts and this Committee in the provision of any further information requested. In the meantime, Sudan was open to receive anybody who was interested to know about the situation as far as this case was concerned.

The Committee took note of the oral information supplied by the Government and the discussion which had taken place in the Committee. It regretted that, despite the guarantees given in 1992, the Government had not supplied on time a report for examination by the Committee of Experts. The Committee indicated its great concern with regard to the attitude of the Government, recalling that it formed part of the international community and that it was not sufficient to invoke tribal traditions in order to avoid implementing the provisions of this fundamental Convention. The Committee noted that the Government had stated that it had formed an investigatory committee, which had not been able to establish any of the matters alleged before the UN. The Committee recalled that this case referred to serious violations of human rights in respect of men, women and children, including forms of slavery, forced labour, abductions and looting, a situation which was systematic and organized. The Committee also noted that the Government had not dealt with the suggestion of the Committee to the effect that it consider forms of appropriate assistance from the Office, including direct contacts. The Committee noted that the Government had recently supplied a report on this Convention in Arabic. The Committee hoped that it would examine this report at its next meeting. Nevertheless, having taken into account the seriousness of the alleged matters and the fact that this case had been the subject of special paragraphs on two occasions without there being any verifiable progress, the Committee decided to mention this case in its report in the special paragraph concerning continued failure to implement.

Convention No. 35: Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933

Chile (ratification: 1935). A Government representative pointed out that this Convention recognized and regulated a former model of "Bismarckian" social security which was now obsolete. He stated that, in 1992, the Government had provided information which clearly showed that the pension scheme established in 1980 was part of a complete transformation of the social security system and fulfilled the principles accepted by the ILO. This transformation did not weaken but rather confirmed and, in fact, perfected the spirit and the objectives which were contained in Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37 and 38 of 1933 which were now obsolete. He declared that, as requested by the Committee of Experts, a report would be sent for the period ending 30 June 1994 containing new and detailed information, demonstrating the Government's unfailing willingness to discuss and its desire to find a solution to the differences of opinion expressed concerning the application of the Convention, which it felt were purely formal, and, more importantly, the applicability with respect to the legal effect of the Convention. He referred to the ideas contained in the report of the Director-General which, in his opinion, constituted a factor of orientation in the analysis of the social security situation in each country. He referred to, as illustrations of these aspects, the indication in the Director-General's report that the development of social protection was an internal matter and that only limited assistance could be provided from the outside. What confirmed the experience demonstrating the evolution of social insurance to social security was the current direction of policy toward the formation of not only simple social insurance schemes but also integrated social security programmes, in which in a simultaneous or complimentary manner models of social security, social assistance, social services as well as other measures were applied to combat poverty. This also confirmed that to resort solely to technical means for social security was insufficient if macro-economic policies to obtain a balanced and independently sustained growth were not put into practice. Social security tended to become a basic principle of the modern State, like the principles of liberty and equality before the law. The entire policy of a government had, therefore, to be oriented towards the creation of conditions for a healthy economy and society. He stated that the primary objectives of a policy based on the principles of social security were to achieve: self-sustaining economic growth; a macroeconomic balance which permitted an increase in job offers and an improvement in the salaries and pensions of workers; and a lowering of monetary inflation. He emphasized that the policy which Chile was applying coincided with these modern orientations, in that it had established a social security programme which covered all generally acceptable social contingencies, by means of different institutional models which complemented each other, within which the State had assumed the greater financial burden through a general tax regime, taking care at the same time to formulate a macro-economic policy which, in practice, permitted a growth in product which in the past year amounted to 10 per cent of the internal product, an unemployment rate of 4.2 per cent, and a substantial decrease in monetary inflation.

Finally, he stated that, while the Convention had not been applied since 1980, it was the will of the Government to maintain a constructive dialogue and it would provide additional information in future reports, permitting the Committee of Experts to make a legal analysis, which would demonstrate that the present system did not prejudice the workers' interests, as had been the case with the previous legislation. This information should allow for an adequate interpretation of the standards in question. He expressed the hope that systematic criteria would be established so that this controversy, which was of a formal nature and did not raise any substantial questions concerning the application of the Convention, could be overcome. He expressed the hope that it would be recognized that urgent changes were needed to respond to these problems.

The Workers' members recalled that the important discrepancies between Legislative Decree No. 3500 of 1980, as amended by Act No. 18964 of 1990, and the Convention had been raised by the Committee of Experts and discussed by this Committee for a number of years and had also been the subject of the committee set up for the examination of the representation made by the National Trade Union Coordinating Council (CNS) of Chile. They pointed out the incompatibilities between the pension system in Chile and the Convention with respect to: the compulsory contribution of employers; the financial contributions of the public authorities; the participation of insured persons in the management of all insurance institutions; and the administration of insurance schemes by non-profit-making institutions. They noted that the Government was going to send a detailed report to the Office and that it was open to dialogue, but pointed out that the Government had not demonstrated its desire to change the system. Furthermore, they noted that the Government, convinced of the effectiveness and the objectivity of its system, wished to maintain it in its present state and thus firmly resisted the application of the international labour standards. The Workers' members emphasized that the criteria of efficiency and objectivity, the importance of which they recognized, were not incompatible with Convention No. 35 and the revised Conventions. They noted that, in this regard, the present system was not in conformity with the revised Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), nor with the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivor's Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128), which were more recent instruments which had not been ratified by Chile. They further indicated that criticism and doubts had been expressed with respect to this system in the analysis published in the International Labour Review in 1992 as concerned the insufficiency of solidarity between the different generations and the different social categories, the benefits guaranteed and the future return of investments. The Workers' members noted that no progress had been made since the creation of the new system with respect to the issues of non-compliance of the Convention and requested the Government to reconsider its position in the light of the comments made by the Committee of Experts and the doubts expressed as to the efficiency and objectivity of the system.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had already been discussed in this Committee on numerous occasions and wondered why this technical question was so often addressed. They pointed out that the private old-age insurance scheme, which was the subject of the Committee of Experts' comments, was being established in other Latin American countries and noted that it might actually be a successful system. Regardless of its success, however, the scheme being discussed in this case was clearly not in compliance with the Convention. Even the Government had admitted that the Convention had not been applied in the country since the adoption of the new scheme in 1980. As concerned the need for legislation providing for compulsory contributions from employers to the financial resources of the scheme, they noted the Government's indication that participation was ensured indirectly through wage negotiations. It did not seem, however, that this indirect form of contribution would ensure the application of the Convention on this point. Under the Convention, contributions from employers could be dispensed with only in respect of national insurance schemes not restricted in scope to employed persons. With respect to the financial contributions to be made by the public authority, only a limited guarantee was made in the national legislation and, while they felt that the discrepancy was not great, the existing measures were not sufficient for the full application of this obligation. They noted that the requirements of the Convention with respect to the administration of the scheme by non-profit institutions reflected the times of the drafting of the Convention when very little had been known about how the market operated and there was a great fear of exposing pension schemes to market risks. But again, there was no question that the scheme existing in Chile was not in conformity with this provision. They noted the Government's indication that, while insured persons could not participate formally in the Pension Fund Administrations (AFPs), these AFPs were more efficient. They stressed, however, that efficiency was no substitute for formal participation. Finally, they noted that the Convention had been drafted in 1933 when the faith in the necessity for state control was the prevalent view and when there was little confidence in the positive effects of the market. At that time, it was inconceivable that a social insurance scheme could be operated by economically active enterprises. Sixty years later, the Convention requirements were the same. Perhaps the new scheme which was the subject of this case would indeed be very successful, but it was not in conformity with the Convention. They could see no way of resolving this discrepancy.

The Workers' member of Colombia indicated that he had taken the opportunity to get to know the Chilean social security system better by going to the country. He emphasized that this system represented the negation of all basic principles of social security: solidarity and universality. Through this system, a return had been made to the systems of pre-paid medicine, family compensation funds had been eliminated and only the system of financial capitalism was actually benefiting. He concluded that this model could only be imposed in a military or civil dictatorship and underlined the seriousness of this situation, which actually lay in the possibility that the system's bad example could be picked up by other Latin American countries and could have serious consequences for the development of an integral social security system. He suggested that the Committee of Experts make a comparative analysis of the impact of the previous system and of the present one.

The Workers' member of Nicaragua pointed out that, as expressed by the Government, it would appear that the problem was only one of accounting. He stated, however, that this was a Utopian view since everything changed when inflation diminished the real value of salaries. The old system and the present system were not the same because if they were, why did the Government not take the measures requested by the Committee of Experts? He noted that what was really happening was privatization which touched health, education and social security. He indicated that this was a problem which affected everyone, given that this model was spreading throughout Latin America. Efforts were being made to establish this model in Nicaragua as well. The worker's money was placed into forced savings reinvested in enterprises which in turn invested the funds for their own benefit, creating insecurity for the worker as to what might happen to the private company in the future. This was very different from investing the worker's money in social security. He concluded by expressing his certainty that the Government understood that the problem was not of an accounting nature, but rather a substantive one. Nevertheless, the Government had found a new source of funds with which it could carry out very good business deals.

The Workers' member of New Zealand, recalling that this case concerned non-compliance with specific technical requirements of a Convention which had been voluntarily ratified, urged the Committee to adopt firm conclusions and to recommend the Government to review its position and to take the necessary measures to ensure compliance with the Convention.

The Employers' member of Chile pointed out that account had not been taken of the fact that the former pension scheme in Chile had failed and that it was impossible to maintain a system based on redistribution. He indicated that it was necessary to take into consideration the results achieved by the new system: present pensions were 50 per cent higher than under the old system and workers actually did participate in private social security institutions, five of which were actually run by workers. Finally, he stated that there was no intention to export the system, but rather other countries which wanted to import it. This should give rise to reflection on the matter.

The Government representative pointed out that the former social security system, which approximately corresponded to the classical "Bismarckian" system, was being compared to the current system, which was adapted to the present situation of the country. It was not simply a new pension system; the present social security system covered, with 25 per cent of the national budget, the pensions of the former system as this had been in deficit. His Government was not present in this Committee in order to defend the new pension scheme in the country and Chile was a democracy in which this question was openly debated. He recognized that this was a question which could be discussed, but not in this meeting of this Committee where we did not come to discuss the technical merits of the new Chilean pensions system, but rather the strictly legal question of the application of the Convention. He expressed the hope that the Committee would take into account the fact that the Government intended to submit a detailed report in which it would refer to the considerations which would permit this conflict to be resolved.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government, in particular the indication that the Convention, which dated back to 1933, adopted a "Bismarckian" model and that the pension scheme adopted in Chile in 1980 perfected the objectives of the Convention and was in line with the essential principles of modern social security. The Committee noted, in particular, that, according to the Government, the Convention had not been applied in Chile since 1980, when social security insurance went bankrupt. The Committee noted the absence of progress with respect to the questions which had been discussed on several occasions in this Committee concerning Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention. The Committee thus urged the Government to take measures to modify the legal pension scheme in the manner requested by the Committee of Experts and recalled the possibility of ILO technical assistance.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection, 1947

Jamaica (ratification: 1962). A Government representative indicated that the Labour Department in Jamaica had been experiencing a number of difficulties over the last few years due, in large part, to the budget cuts resulting from the measures taken for structural adjustment. He noted, however, that it had always been difficult to recruit and retain suitably qualified labour inspectors, particularly in the area of occupational safety and health, because of the low level of public sector remuneration. Insufficient staff and inadequate equipment and transportation facilities due to reduced budgets resulted in irregular inspection visits, inadequate inspection and poor data collection and collation. Faced with these difficulties, the Government had decided to seek the assistance of the ILO in the restructuring and reorganizing of the inspectorate. The Government had also contracted the services of an international firm to carry out an audit of the total operation of the Ministry of Labour and Welfare. It was hoped that these efforts would result in a more streamlined inspectorate which would permit the Government fully to meet its obligations under the Convention. As concerned the application of Article 13, paragraphs 2(b) and 3, of the Convention, he stated that the tripartite Labour Advisory Committee was still in the process of reviewing all the labour legislation and was awaiting the input which would be provided from the technical assistance of the ILO. In respect of Article 14, it was hoped that the matter would be finalized very soon.

The Employers' members noted that this was an essential Convention which was very rarely dealt with in this Committee. Insufficient inspection could have a serious impact on a large number of workers. They recalled that the dialogue with the Government on this case had been quite difficult as the Government had once again not supplied its report for examination by the Committee of Experts and, in 1992, had failed to take part in the discussions in this Committee on this case. They supported the Committee of Experts' requests for the Government to: submit annual inspection reports; provide for legislation empowering factory inspectors to require measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health and safety of workers; and take measures to require the notification of occupational diseases. They noted that no progress had been made with respect to these issues for many years and, therefore, recommended that firm conclusions be drafted.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the Employers' members and stressed that, given the importance of the question of inspection, the conclusions should reflect the Committee's deep concern and insist that the necessary measures be taken in the very near future. They added that the Government might wish to consider technical assistance from the ILO on this matter.

The Government representative noted the comments made and indicated that ILO technical assistance had already been sought to remedy the situation.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government and in particular that it had requested ILO technical assistance in order to undertake the reorganization of the labour inspectorate. The Committee recalled the fundamental importance of this Convention as a means of ensuring the application of social and labour legislation and expressed the hope that the Government would communicate detailed information on the measures adopted to apply the Convention, including the annual inspection reports, for review by the Committee of Experts at its next meeting. The Committee trusted that the provisions of Articles 13 and 14 of the Convention would be put into practice and that it would be able to note concrete progress in the very near future.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Bolivia (ratification: 1965). A Government representative, the Minister of Labour, stated that the Government, with the assistance of the ILO, had drawn up a new draft General Labour Law which had been submitted to the employers' and workers' organizations for comments. The Government hoped that these organizations would reply and stated that it would continue its efforts to secure the approval of the new law in Parliament. With regard to the first three points raised by the Committee of Experts, he stated that the draft law guaranteed the right to organize along with all other social rights that were due to civil servants; trade unions were not required to obtain any prior authorization in order to establish a union organization; and there was no prohibition on setting up more than one union in an enterprise. The Decree No. 22407 reaffirmed and guaranteed freedom of association, as well as the free and autonomous functioning of the unions. With respect to the other points raised by the Committee of Experts, he declared that the legal provisions referred to were obsolete and were not applied in practice: labour inspectors did not interfere in any form in the activities of the union organizations; no cases had risen in recent years of the union being dissolved by administrative means; in practice the workers, including those in the public sector, had the right to strike and could declare a strike without meeting any type of obligations and arbitration was no longer compulsory. In the last ten years the frequency of strikes had indeed increased in the various sectors of the economy. Workers could declare a strike at any time including solidarity strikes and general strikes. All of the above-mentioned gaps in the existing labour legislation had been recognized and were dealt with in the new draft General Labour Law which has been submitted to the ILO and studied by the ILO experts. Therefore, most of the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerned obsolete instruments. Referring also to the agreement concluded between the Government and the central workers' organization, he considered it important to take into account the actual practice. The Government was making every effort for the new General Labour Law to be submitted for consideration by the next session of the Parliament, following consultations with the social partners, in order to have modern and effective regulations which could ensure all of the fundamental rights of workers.

The Employers' members recalled that the Report of the Committee of Experts stated that for many years now comments had been made on a number of points which had accumulated since the case of Bolivia had first been discussed by this Committee in 1983. Points 1 to 5 mentioned by the Committee of Experts were very clear matters where the Employers supported the Committee of Experts. As far as the question of strikes was concerned, the Employers considered, for instance, that a State might prohibit general strikes and sympathy strikes because this right did not actually ensue from the Convention, but obviously the Government had the right to follow any recommendations that the Committee of Experts might make. The Employer's members took note of the declaration of the Government representative that all these points were now outdated and that they would be changed in the draft General Labour Law. The Committee of Experts asked the Government to address all of these different issues in its next report and to present a report on the state of affairs. The Employers associated themselves with this request. If all of the points were actually to be covered by the new law, then there would be no further problems and possibly the discussion in this Committee would help to accelerate this process.

The Workers' members fully agreed with the remarks made by the Employers' members that the violations in question had been known for a number of years and were quite important. According to the Government representative, there were no problems in practice on essentially all the points raised by the Committee of Experts and all of them would be dealt with in the new draft legislation. The Workers' members regretted that there was no proof of this nor were there texts to determine the state of things in relation to the application of the Convention in legislation and in practice. They did not doubt the progress in the political democratization of the country, but were also aware of the difficulties demonstrated by the suppression of the workers' demonstrations at the beginning of 1993, by the prohibition of the strike of 48 hours at the same time and by the prohibition of the strike of teachers. The Workers considered it most urgent to clarify the situation and therefore strongly associated themselves with the request made by the Committee of Experts and supported by the Employers' members that the Government should supply in the near future the reports and the clarifications necessary to assess the situation.

The Employers' member of Bolivia stated that the comments made by the Committee of Experts were formally correct in that they pointed out that certain legislative texts that still existed in Bolivian law were in conflict with the provisions of the Convention. However, as stated by the Government representative, the points mentioned by the Committee of Experts were obsolete and did not exist in practice. However, anyone reading the Experts' report might get an impression that in Bolivia there still existed a situation of repression or very severe restrictions on the trade union movement. This was not so, and Bolivia was known as a country in which trade union organizations were very active. Bolivian employers did not agree with the comments of the Committee of Experts with regard to the right to strike and supported the position which the Employers' members had taken with regard to the scope of the Convention concerning the right to strike. The draft law had been worked out with the help of the ILO which was still being considered by the social partners. This process should be reactivated on the basis of a social and technical analysis through a tripartite dialogue.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government with regard to the points that have been under discussion for a number of years. The Committee regretted that no progress was able to be noted with regard to the problems mentioned by the Committee of Experts and hoped that the new draft General Labour Law under discussion would effectively meet these concerns in the very near future. The Committee requested the Government to submit a detailed report to the ILO on the issues raised and reminded the Government that it could have recourse to the technical assistance of the ILO.

In addition, a Government representative reiterated the written information presented by her Government with respect to: the right of workers to establish trade union organizations as they wished without opposition from the Government; the conclusions formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning a complaint brought against the Government with regard to a request for registration of a union; and the question of the election of trade union leaders. Finally, she stated that, if the Government dictated rules to the unions and, in particular, with respect to who should represent them, this would be contrary to Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee of Experts' request in the last part of its report was, therefore, unjustified.

The Workers' members noted that, in this case, the problem was not that information was not being provided by the Government, but rather that too much information was provided on detailed points and of a very similar nature to that which had been provided for many years now. They queried whether any real change was actually taking place in the country. They recalled that the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the amendments made to articles 7 and 99 of the Cuban Constitution, but noted that more needed to be done. The constitutional amendments had significant implications for the rest of the labour legislation, including the Labour Code, which needed to be reviewed and amended, after consultation with the trade unions, so as to bring it into line with the changes in the Constitution and to omit any reference to the single central workers' organization. They emphasized that no one questioned whether the trade union movement in the country could form a single confederation if it desired, but the Government had to take the necessary measures to ensure that alternative trade unions could be formed. While the Government had provided information on the creation of the National Union of Science Workers, this information was insufficient to judge whether this was an independent trade union. They requested the Government to provide further information in this regard. Despite the assurances given by the Government that workers did have the right to establish organizations of their own choosing, they noted that, when such efforts were made by, for example, the Confederation of Democratic Workers of Cuba, the people concerned were harassed and arrested. It appeared, therefore, that it was not so easy to set up an independent trade union. The amendments made to the Constitution were not sufficient to ensure the right to establish freely independent trade union organizations. Measures had to be taken to guarantee this right by adapting all the legislation appropriately and by taking steps to ensure its application in practice. They noted that discussions on Cuba had often been too aggressive from all sides. The reports supplied by the Government to the Committee of Experts carried both an aggressive and a defensive tone. The Workers' members indicated, however, their desire to help the Government to move towards change. They encouraged it to take further steps to ensure the freedom of the trade union movement. They expressed the hope that they would see further developments in this direction next year and indicated that such changes would be welcomed with satisfaction. They cautioned, however, that sterile repetition of the arguments put forward over the decades would result in a regression to the aggressive debates of the past.

The Employers' members stated that they were a bit doubtful about the progress made in this case. The written information provided by the Government was substantively the same as that indicated last year. While the constitutional amendments were a step in the right direction, it still appeared that very little had changed. The reference to the Central Organization of Workers (CTC) in the Labour Code still remained. They recalled that this case had been discussed in this Committee for many years and the small changes made were still very far from ensuring the right to establish, in practice, the trade union organization of one's choosing. They queried whether another union would ever be able to be registered in Cuba with ease and without the bureaucratic red tape designed to impede its establishment. They expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary steps to ensure that State mandated trade union monopoly no longer existed.

The Workers' member of Paraguay recalled that this case had been discussed for many years and that, each year, this Committee formulated conclusions requesting the Government to provide further explanation. The declarations subsequently made by the Government were never satisfactory and did not guarantee the principles of freedom of association and human rights. He stated that the trade union rights and the conscience of Cuban trade unionists had been violated for 34 years because they did not have the right to establish or join any trade union organization other than the Central Organization of Workers. He indicated that the time had come for the ILO to move on to a second stage: to stop discussions without substance and to undertake concrete action to ensure respect for freedom of association. Cuban workers should have the right to live in freedom as well as to choose freely the trade union organization to which they wished to belong. The ILO should take measures other than those adopted up till now in order to try to obtain the guarantee for trade union rights in Cuba and to ensure that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 were no longer violated.

The Workers' member of the United States pointed out that there were three kinds of countries which violated the principle of freedom of association. Some countries allowed unions to operate freely but restricted their free activity in certain sectors such as the public service or essential industries. In this case while the violation was substantial it was only an aberration. In other countries, unions were allowed to exist, but everything was done to impede their activities. These cases required constant vigilance in order to ensure the survival of the unions and the extension of the full meaning of freedom of association to them. The case being discussed here fell in the third category, namely independent unions were not allowed to be freely established and all means were used to suppress anyone who tried to do so. The Government did not even acknowledge the petitions lodged by the General Union of Cuban Workers (UGTC) or by CONCI to be registered. The only organization permitted in Cuba was the CTC because its leaders were chosen by the Communist Party, which the CTC recognized as the vanguard and the highest organ of the working class. He stated that the State's position of imposing a union monopoly manifested itself in the arrest and physical assault of UGTC leaders on various occasions, such as a protest against the failure of the CTC to represent the interests of workers and a May Day demonstration. He requested this Committee to urge the Government to provide additional information in the near future on the concrete steps taken to permit the free establishment of free trade unions as this was only the first step in ensuring that they might be full and effective participants in society.

The Workers' member of Cuba pointed out that, with respect to the independence of the trade union movement and to the comments made in this regard in the Committee of Experts' report, the relations between the Cuban Communist Party and the Central Organization of Workers did not in any way compromise the continuity of the trade union movement and that these relations were in conformity with the resolution on the independence of the trade union movement adopted by the ILO in 1952. He pointed out that, as indicated in the statutes of the Central Organization of Workers, the CTC was not an organization of the Communist Party nor of the State, and did not receive any financing from them. He indicated that the members of the CTC approved the statutes, rules and guidelines of work and elected its leaders in an open and democratic manner. No candidates had been proposed by the Communist Party. The fact of recognizing the Communist Party as the vanguard of the working class in the preamble of the CTC statutes did not at all mean that the Party interfered in its internal affairs. The relationship between the CTC and the Communist Party is approved by the workers democratically and it was only they who could change it. Trade union and social freedom had existed in Cuba for 34 years and the CTC based all its action on permanent consultation with the workers. The CTC developed its trade union action freely in the more than 70,000 workplaces in the country and had no indication or information about workers setting up another union, apart from the distorted and ill-intentioned information financed by international organizations which, for political reasons, entered the country.

The Government member of the United States, noting the importance placed on technical assistance from the ILO and the fact that, last year, this Committee had urged the Government to consult with the ILO on this matter, suggested that it might be appropriate that the Government discuss the possible ways of resolving this situation with the ILO.

The Government representative stated, in reply to the questions asked by the Workers' members, that a change in the Constitution had occurred and that this change had been noted by the Committee of Experts in its comments, a change which expressed the Government's will to respect the independence and autonomy of trade union organisations. She stated that, in Cuba, the workers exercising freedom of association had adopted the trade union structure which they had considered most appropriate. The changes to the Constitution were representative of the Government's will. The Labour Code only reflected a tradition of unity in the workers' movements. In Cuba there were 18 national branch unions which had, of their own will, formed one central union organization since 1939. This showed that the Government would not impose by legislative means trade union pluralism, since if it did so this would be an imposition contrary to the Convention in the same way as if legislative means were used to impose a system of trade union unity. The adoption of one or the other form of trade union organization was a matter to be left solely to the workers. The Committee of Experts was in a position to analyse, in the light of the new Constitution, what was the Government's position in this regard. The obstacle to the creation of what was here described as independent organization was not in the law. The CTC was not a party or state body, as was clear from its statutes. The difficulty in question was a consequence of the lack of credibility and from the fact that the workers did not trust certain individuals who were not trade unionists and who were ready to be manipulated from overseas for political and propaganda ends. In no workplace did workers want to follow persons they did not know or elect and who did not act in the name of any union, and whose concerns were not of a union nature. As for the ILO technical assistance mentioned, she stated that her Government had requested such assistance on many occasions when it felt that it was necessary and desirable and it had always received a favourable reply from the Office. The Government would request such assistance when it considered it necessary, but would do so based on its own decision and after having first sought its own solutions to its problems.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government. Like this Committee of Experts, this Committee noted with interest the amendments made to the national Constitution. On the other hand, it could only be regretted that the Government once again felt that it was not in contradiction with the Convention with respect to the independence and autonomy of trade union organizations. The Committee urged the Government to review its position in order to guarantee all workers and employers the right to establish occupational organizations outside of the existing structure if they so desired. The Committee trusted that the Government would submit detailed information in the near future on the issues raised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee recalled that the International Labour Office could provide technical assistance to governments upon their request.

Chad (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that the National Sovereign Conference had expressed its agreement with the comments of the Committee of Experts and requested the Government to recognize freedom of association. In this respect it had requested the repeal of Ordinance No. 30 suspending all strike action throughout the country and Ordinance No. 001 prohibiting public and similar employees from exercising the right to organize. The draft laws repealing these Ordinances had been already submitted to the Council of Ministers. Having recognized the earlier error of including trade unions within the scope of laws governing associations in general, the Government was proposing that trade unions should only be regulated by the provisions of the Convention and the Labour Code. Furthermore, various amendments to the procedures for strikes had been communicated to the Committee of Experts and the Government was awaiting the Committee's comments. Despite the fact that the Government was vigilant in fulfilling its international obligations, it was confronted by a series of problems that required the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Workers' members, while noting the repeal of Ordinances Nos. 30 and 001 called for by the National Sovereign Conference, noted that the comments of the Committee of Experts and the complaints examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association also concerned other violations of fundamental principles of the Convention. The supervisory bodies had noted that every time the Government considered its interests were violated, it may threaten to take measures against trade unions which could endanger their very existence. The Workers' members considered that such a situation could not permit the creation of a climate of cooperation necessary for the conclusion of a social pact and the resolution of the current economic crisis. If the Government was determined to change the situation, it should examine the current situation, faced by the workers and the employers, as well as the comments of the Committee of Experts and of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Workers' members were of the opinion that it was important to urge the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention and to follow up all the comments made by the Committee of Experts. In this respect they considered that the technical assistance of the ILO could be useful and requested the Government to provide information on measures taken in law and practice to implement the Convention.

The Employers' members stated that the outright prohibition of the right to strike, the prohibition of public servants' right to organize, the requirement of prior authorization for the formation of trade unions, as well as the other points raised by the Committee of Experts constituted violations of the Convention. They therefore considered the national law should be changed. The Government representative had stated that these amendments had already been partially made. They therefore considered that copies of the amendments should be provided to the Committee of Experts for an assessment of the progress made. The Employers' members also stressed the importance for the Government to provide detailed reports on all the points contained in the report of the Committee of Experts so that it could re-examine the situation.

The Workers' member of Senegal was of the opinion that it was important that this Committee be informed of the repeated violations of this Convention as regards the workers of Chad. He considered that it was absolutely necessary that international organizations act to put a stop to these violations. He pointed out that in many African countries a national conference rarely resolved the problems relating to human rights and in particular those relating to trade union rights and other workers' rights. In light of the promises made by the Government to this Committee, the speaker requested the firm intervention of the ILO in order to ensure Chad's compliance with international law.

The Workers' member of Greece wanted the Government representative to clearly indicate if Ordinance No. 27 of 1962 had been repealed, thus permitting trade unions to organize themselves. If this was the case the Government should be requested to communicate a copy of the repealing law. While acknowledging the fact that Chad was a country that had long suffered from war, he pointed out that the prohibition of freedom of association did not constitute a way out of the crisis.

The Government representative noted with interest the comments made and reiterated the fact that the Committee on Labour and Social Security would soon be deciding on the submission to the Council of Ministers of draft laws prepared following tripartite consultations. More specifically, following a compromise with the trade unions, the transitional government had submitted a draft law to bring unions within the scope of the Labour Code and not that of Ordinance No. 27. She further requested the indulgence of this Committee in view of the problems faced and of the new positive climate currently prevailing. She hoped that in future a mission from the ILO would provide technical assistance and note the improvement in the matters relating to this Convention.

The Committee noted the oral information provided by the Government representative and expressed its deep concern regarding the very large discrepancies between the law and practice, and the terms of the Convention, given that for many years the Committee of Experts had been urging the Government to repeal the Ordinances of 1975 and 1976 and the provisions of the Labour Code which contravened this Convention. The Committee also deplored the fact that the Committee on Freedom of Association, at its May 1993 Session, had to examine a complaint presented by international trade union organizations concerning in particular the administrative suspension of the Union of Trade Unions of Chad, the prohibition of its operations and the occupation of its headquarters by the police. The Committee further deplored these violations of freedom of association both in law and in practice and urged the Government to meet its international obligations in this regard. The Committee noted with interest the draft law abolishing the prior administrative authorization for the formation of trade unions. It also noted with interest the Government's proposal regarding the necessary amendments to the right to strike. The Committee noted the Government's intention to request the technical assistance of the Office to resolve the problems mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Committee hoped that the Government's next report would contain information on the concrete progress made in decisions regarding the full implementation of this Convention.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative stated that some elements of the statements made by the Minister of Labour to this Committee last year were still valid. In fact, the presence of the authorities, in accordance with the law, at some trade union meetings, as well as their interventions with regard to their by-laws and in other cases (for example, internal conflicts) was requested by the unions themselves. The prohibition in the law of members representing the employer before his workers, or members of the top management of an enterprise from becoming members of the executive of a trade union was intended to ensure the autonomy and independence of trade unions from the employers. He recalled that in 1991 a new constitution was adopted and the task of harmonizing legislation with the constitutional standards would involve much work and require a lot of time going beyond the mandate of the current Government. The Government, however, was committed to consulting the social partners in the elaboration of the necessary labour standards. In this respect, the Government wished to hold consultations with regard to the tripartite committee provided for in the Constitution (formation, duties, etc.) and with regard to the definition of essential public services (entrusted to the Legislature by the Constitution). However, not all the information requested from the social partners had yet been received. The Government hoped the Congress would set aside time for the harmonization of the legislation with the Constitution and ILO Conventions which were part of national legislation. With regard to the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts at the serious climate of violence prevailing in the country, he reiterated the position stated by the Minister of Labour last year which excluded the public interest from the scope of the Convention and added his Government would be among the first to share this concern about the prevailing climate of violence while, at the same time, rejecting the existence of a policy that violated freedom of association and other human rights. This climate of violence was the result of innumerable conflicts between guerrilla groups and other groups linked to drug trafficking. After describing in detail some of his Government's major successes against these two plagues, he stated that the victims of assassinations were not only trade unionists but also included ministers, prosecutors, presidential candidates, directors of papers and journalists, state officials, judges and citizens. This was a general phenomenon and did not only affect trade unionists. Many trade unionists had been assassinated in the Utabá region by their former comrades in arms when some guerrilla groups decided to join the peace process. Finally, he stressed the total adherence to human rights and democratic principles of his country's Constitution.

The Workers' members recalled that this Committee had discussed this case at length last year. The Committee of Experts also had noted some progress in 1992 while noting a series of discrepancies between the national legislation and the principles of freedom of association. In 1993 the Committee of Experts, basing itself on the conclusions of this Committee in 1992, had noted again that such discrepancies continued to exist. The Workers' members also indicated that the Committee on Freedom of Association had examined seven complaints against Colombia containing very serious allegations that threatened the life and security of trade unionists and the right to collective bargaining. The Committee of Experts had expressed its concern about this serious climate of violence which made the exercise of freedom of association very difficult. In view of the lack of progress, the Workers' members supported the request made by the Committee of Experts that the Government amend the provisions of the law which impeded the exercise of freedom of association and put an end to arbitrary administrative practices, and thus ensure, in practice, the enjoyment of the freedom of association. They considered that the appropriate framework to prepare the necessary changes existed, and referred to the tripartite national committee provided for in the Constitution and mentioned by the Government in 1992, and to the technical assistance of the ILO. Last year, the Government had stated that this tripartite committee would be set up and that its objectives were set out in broad terms. It appeared to the Workers' members that, since then, this tripartite Committee had not yet been set up and it was no longer a priority of the Government. This was why they asked, as had the Committee of Experts, that the law and practice be brought into conformity with the Convention and suggested in this respect that the national tripartite committee be involved in these changes. With regard to the various limitations on strikes and the right of the Minister of Labour and the President to interfere in labour conflicts, the Workers' members referred to the jurisprudence of the Committee on Freedom of Association which only permitted recourse to compulsory arbitration in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term. This jurisprudence had been specifically confirmed by the Committee in cases concerning Colombia. They repeated their concern at the repressive measures taken in a climate of violence which, for example, labelled striking workers as terrorists, and urged the Government to take the necessary legislative and practical measures so as to ensure the full application of the Convention. They expressed the wish that the conclusions of this Committee should be drafted in the strictest of terms, in view of the doubts concerning the Government's real commitment to cooperating with the supervisory bodies of the ILO so as to ensure progress in this case and all the more so since this case had already been the subject of a special paragraph two years ago. They considered that mere declarations of intention by the Government did not suffice.

The Employers' members pointed out that it was necessary to weigh the climate of extreme violence prevailing in the country in drawing any conclusions in this case. They pointed out that last year the Committee of Experts had noted that some progress had been made but has, this year, raised ten points of varying importance that required improvement. With regard to the discrepancies involving the internal management of trade unions, the Employers' members shared the comments of the Committee of Experts which considered them to limit clearly freedom of association. With regard to the limitations on the right to strike, they reiterated their position stated in 1992. The Government had often stated its readiness to take measures regarding strikes as shown by the draft law submitted to Parliament and by the new Constitution of 1991. Nevertheless, with regard to essential services which according to the Constitution were to be defined by law, the Employers' members stated that this was, in principle, acceptable but that one would have to wait for the adoption of the said law and its application in practice before being able to assess the situation. With regard to intervention by the authorities in collective disputes by convening a compulsory arbitration tribunal, the Employers' members fully shared the Committee of Experts' position. The Committee of Experts stated, however, that when a strike was declared unlawful on the basis of a national standard which contravened the principles of freedom of association, the dismissal of trade union leaders, even if it was lawful, would be contrary to the Convention. The Employers' members stated that it was difficult to understand this position of the Committee of Experts, given that it was derived from a hypothesis based on something outside the scope of the Convention. With regard to the other points concerning the necessary amendments mentioned by the Committee of Experts, the Employers' members noted the progress already made, but pointed out that additional measures needed to be taken. Taking into account the difficulties faced by Colombia today, they were of the view that the choice was between being more patient or, on the contrary, applying more pressure. Many of the practical violations of the Convention were not attributable to the Government. That was why one had to maintain a critical dialogue with the Government taking into account the improvements already noted by the Committee of Experts and remembering that this was an extreme situation. The Employers' members hoped the Government would provide a very detailed report so as to enable them to examine the case in detail next year.

The Workers' member of New Zealand stated that he wished to associate specifically the New Zealand Workers with this case because of the seriousness of the allegations. He stated that the reference by the Committee of Experts to a "serious" situation of violence "preventing full exercise of the trade union activities", while acknowledging respect to the learned Committee and its concern to be neutral, was a serious understatement of the intimidation and horror of the reality of life for trade unionists in Colombia today. From the information in the Committee of Experts' Report, and the additional information made available by the Workers, it was clear that there was a sustained campaign of legal frustration and obstruction, as well as brutal killings and intimidation, directed at curtailing collective workers' organizations and bargaining in Colombia. He stated that he could only feel humble that workers and union officials in Colombia continued to attempt to exercise their rights in such a dangerous situation. This was a case where one felt very strongly the frustration of the Committee of Experts, reflected in its comments in paragraph 111 of its Report, regarding the inadequacy of sanctions to secure observance of Conventions – particularly where such gross violation of basic human rights were concerned.

A Workers' member of Colombia stated that in his country it was impossible to develop trade union life because social action was treated as a crime. His Government, under the pretext of combating drug trafficking, had adopted an anti-terrorist Decree and established laws on public order, but in 1992 only 6 per cent of the 618 persons detained under this law were drug traffickers and guerrillas, the rest being persons belonging to social organizations. He explained that the above-mentioned anti-terrorist statute established a procedural system which did not recognize the right to a defence and the principle of public trials, and established secret judges, public prosecutors, magistrates, witnesses, evidence and experts. Seventeen workers of the TELECOM enterprise had been jailed under this statute, and the president of the principal Colombian refinery was detained after having discussed a list of demands and having obtained a satisfactory agreement for the workers. The speaker himself had been threatened by the General Public Prosecutor with possible criminal proceedings for having obstructed justice, after a visit in order to discuss the application of the above-mentioned system to trade unionism. The anti-terrorist Decree increased penalties disproportionally, established special procedures for complicity, covered up much misconduct at the discretion of judges and converted the labour struggle into a political crime. Moreover, he indicated that different criminal provisions applied to trade union activities. Under section 290 of the Penal Code, which established the violation of the freedom to work as a crime, trade union leaders of the cement industry were ordered to pay the equivalent of $1 million and sentenced to seven months' imprisonment. The trade unionists of the banking sector were sentenced for "obstruction of work", and those of the National Archives for giving out posters that were supposedly slanderous on the basis of a request made by an employer, and for the supposed falsification of a trade union document. In addition, the arrest of the Secretary-General and President of the National Federation of Cocoa Workers was ordered, as well as the seizure of their property. He regretted that the Government continued to repeat that it would bring the legislation into conformity with the Conventions, at the same time as it accepted the tripartite committee which made unilateral decisions, as in the case of the increase of the minimum wage, and the dismissal of 40,000 public servants, among other examples. In the same manner, the Government decided to reject a draft labour statute endorsed by a million signatures that had been submitted, and justified this by stating that no rules had been established for the plebiscite initiative which was provided for under the Constitution. Finally, he referred to the high number of murdered trade unionists, and the impunity for these crimes which the Government had not acted against, and requested that the Committee record the case in a special paragraph.

Another Workers' member of Colombia regretted having to relate once again the serious circumstances which were oppressing workers with regard to freedom of association and human rights. In his country there was no guarantee for the development of trade union activity, given that many trade unions were destroyed in their formative stages and were established in secrecy. He considered it uncertain that the new law would envisage automatic legal registration of a trade union, since in practice the same legal obstacles continued as before, so that one could not speak of legislative progress. He stated that in his country this Convention was not respected and that a disturbing process was developing of penalization and criminalization of the trade union and labour struggle, with serious repercussions for workers. He gave as examples the situation in respect of air-traffic controllers, and the ECOPETROL and TELECOM firms whose workers had been repressed violently solely for the crime of having defended national sovereignty by opposing the privatization of these firms. Presently, 13 workers were detained for having exercised their rights, having been judged by "faceless judges" under accusations of terrorism, with secret witnesses and evidence and serious restrictions on the lawyers for the defence. Three other leaders of the TELECOM trade union, including its President, Eberto López, were being persecuted and obliged to live in secrecy. He indicated that the firms had been militarized and that in general the workers were experiencing a repressive and humiliating situation. He stated that the murder of trade unionists continued without the Government taking appropriate measures to combat the adversity resulting from such violence. In his opinion, the problem could not be resolved by declarations of civil war, but only through far-reaching social changes. He did not agree with and it seemed inacceptable to him that a link between the guerrillas and the trade unions was alluded to because, among other reasons, the fact that such a link had been made had resulted in numerous murders of workers. He referred to the restructuring and privatization decrees issued in December 1992 which resulted in the dismissal of more than 50,000 state workers and to the abusive use of the concept of essential public services which went so far as to include the hotel industry. He requested that the Committee take measures to prevent the destruction of the trade union movement and the sentencing of the TELECOM trade unionists to long prison terms, and requested that this case be recorded in a special paragraph because of the constant violations of rights of workers and of human rights. He gave the Office a file with information on different aspects raised in his intervention so that they would be made known to the Committee of Experts.

A Workers' member of Panama indicated his concern about the situation described by the Workers' members of Colombia and the explanations of the Government representative that, in his opinion, seemed to justify the murders of trade unionists on the basis of the fact that, in Colombia, not only trade unionists but also judges and presidential candidates were murdered. He considered that this was a serious case involving violations of human rights that should be recorded in a special paragraph of the Report of the Committee.

A Workers' member of France regretted that more and more countries were delaying bringing their legislation in conformity with the Conventions. He stated that, according to the report of the Committee of Experts, in order to form a trade union in Colombia, two-thirds of its members must be Colombians which would exclude foreign workers who would then not have the possibility to express themselves. In addition, he noted that strikes could only be declared at the level of the undertaking, in the presence of a representative of the authorities, which amounted to interference by the Government in trade union activities. He wondered what protection trade unionists had against dismissal in a country that was in the process of opening up its market within the framework of the Andean Pact.

A Workers' member of Spain stated that with regard to the case of Colombia each year the Government repeated the same arguments in this Committee, namely, that the interference by the authorities in trade union meetings was a result of requests made by the trade unions themselves and that in Colombia not only trade unionists but also journalists, government representatives and judges were murdered. He indicated his concern with regard to the so-called "faceless justice", which offended all the most basic legal principles, and to the confusion between trade unionism and terrorism which was an offence to the trade union movement.

A Workers' member of Botswana stressed that the extensive legal repression of the Colombian trade union movement was of utmost concern to African trade unionists. He noted that in Colombia during 1992 more trade unionists were killed than in any other country, and that 800 had been killed since 1987. They were subject to constant intimidation as a direct consequence of activities, whether trade union political or linked to industrial disputes, and as a consequence of their demands for economic, social and human rights for their members. He considered that it was particularly disturbing that those who had committed violations of the right of freedom of association had been able to do so with impunity. For this reason he firmly supported the proposal of the Workers' members and hoped that very severe conclusions would be adopted in this case.

A Workers' member of Germany stated that he was very concerned by the situation in Colombia, where trade unionists were the victims of a large number of arbitrary arrests, summary justice and persecution organized by paramilitary groups. He was surprised that the Employers questioned the findings of the Committee of Experts concerning the exercise of the right to strike and the dismissal of trade unionists in this country. Considering the principles proclaimed under Article 8, paragraph 2, of this Convention, he observed that if an internal law contradicted the Convention, such as the case of a dismissal that was contrary to the Convention, employers were expected to take a clear position on the basis of these principles. Finally, he invited the Committee to formulate very firm conclusions and to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representative mentioned the clear obligations contained in the new Constitution, the labour statute which should be promulgated by Congress, the integration of ratified Conventions into the internal legal system, the definition of essential public services and the regulation of the tripartite committee which had been established by the Constitution but which required the adoption of laws to regulate its composition and functions. In referring to that which had been stated by one of the Workers' members of Colombia in respect of the presentation to Congress of a draft labour statute, he indicated that rules governing popular initiatives provided for under the Constitution had still not been made, and that in any event the decision was to be made by Congress and not by the Government. With regard to the Terrorist Statute and its application to the TELECOM workers, he indicated that the strike concerned was a political strike and that for this reason it had been declared illegal. He explained that the Government had requested the courts to, on the one hand, cancel the legal personality of the TELECOM trade union and, on the other hand, to investigate the criminal acts which could have taken place during the strike. The first was rejected and the second, by a decision of the Public Prosecutor was divided into two separate trials, one before ordinary courts and the second before the anti-terrorist jurisdiction. He referred to the dismissals in the public sector which, he explained, were due to changes in the structure of the State and the national economy. By way of example, he stated that the sector for prior control of public spending had been eliminated, leaving 7,000 workers without employment, and the customs sector where, because of the opening up of imports, officials who had been previously responsible for issuing import permits had lost their employment. He pointed out that compensation and retirement plans had been drawn up which had covered many workers. He contested the assertion that he wished to excuse the death of trade unionists on the basis that there were other murders as well, that he had referred to the need to take into account the overall context in the country, and that he had wanted to establish a link between the guerillas and trade unionism. He indicated that the Government was interested in demilitarizing the country; evidence of this was that for the first time since 1948 the Minister of Defence and the Director of the Administrative Department for Security were not members of the military. With regard to the Andean Pact, he indicated that the promise of a free trade zone would involve problems of adjustment and that the Government would endeavour to give all necessary support to national industry and agriculture so that they could face the competition. He emphasized that his Government took its human rights obligations seriously, proof of which lay in the fact of its voluntary submission to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted its understanding of the serious violent situation confronting the country. The Committee observed that there were still numerous and serious differences between legislation and practice and the principles confirmed by the Convention in the different points raised by the Committee of Experts for several years. The Committee took note with interest that the Government had expressed the will to come to terms with the social partners in labour matters. Nevertheless, the Committee could not fail to note that no progress had been made since this case had been examined in June 1992. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the tripartite committee responsible for drawing up draft legislation would complete its task within a short time period. The Committee continued to be deeply concerned by the situation, both in fact and in law, regarding trade union matters, and urged the Government to adopt urgently the necessary measures, with the technical assistance of the ILO if it wished, in order to reconcile its legislation with the Convention so that the Committee could take note, in the very near future, of concrete and significant progress in this matter.

Costa Rica (ratification: 1960). The Government supplied the following information:

1. The Government has taken legislative measures to:

(a) guarantee that solidarist associations do not become involved in trade union activities. During the current ordinary session of Parliament, the Government has asked the official parliamentary fraction to give priority to the steps leading to the adoption of Bill No. 11273, which adds a paragraph (d) to section 8 of Act No. 6970 (Act on Solidarist Associations) and which specifically prohibits these associations from participating directly or indirectly in collective bargaining of an occupational nature. This legislative measure responds specifically to the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its conclusions relating to Case No. 1483.

(b) guarantee effective protection against all forms of anti-union discrimination. In August 1991, the Government had requested technical assistance from the Director-General of the ILO, to improve and update its labour legislation, particularly in the field of protection against anti-union discrimination. In response to this request, an ILO expert carried out an exploratory mission from 31 March to 10 April 1992 in order to evaluate the actual situation. The said expert drew up a report containing a series of proposals relating to draft legislation on trade union guarantees. After this mission, the assistance of the ILO was requested in order to organize a visit by an official from the Labour Law and Labour Relations Branch of the ILO. This visit was carried out for a week starting on 2 April 1993 and ended with positive results.

During the visit, the draft texts that the Government had decided to submit to Parliament were also presented to this official. The texts in question are the following:

(i) a Bill repealing sections 333 and 334 of the Penal Code, which was approved by the Legislative Assembly and will soon be signed by the President of the Republic so as to enter into force;

(ii) a Bill amending several sections of the Labour Code as well as the Organic Law of the Ministry in order to update fines. The Government attaches as an annex the positive opinion of the majority in the Commission of Legal Affairs. The Bill was approved by the Legislative Commission and will be examined during the current session of the Legislative Assembly;

(iii) a Bill on public employment, proposed by the Government, which is currently the object of bilateral negotiations with the trade unions;

(iv) a Bill on unemployment funds and economic liberalization, which has been submitted by the Government for the current session of the Legislative Assembly;

(v) a Bill on unfair labour practices and the supervision of trade union rights, which will be treated by the bilateral Commission made up of government and trade union representatives.

All these draft Bills have already been studied by the competent services of the ILO whose comments and proposals, which were received on 19 May 1993, were transmitted to the parties involved in bilateral negotiations and to the Legislative Commissions. Within the framework of the continued technical cooperation between the ILO and the Government, a visit by an official of the Labour Law and Labour Relations Branch has been fixed for next July in order to complete the revision of labour legislation which has an emphasis on protection against anti-union discrimination.

(c) guarantee the elimination of all inequalities of treatment between solidarist associations and trade unions. As indicated in the preceding paragraph, the Government has submitted to the Legislative Assembly a Bill on unemployment funds and economic liberalization which changes the compensation to be paid in case of dismissal into a real right by conferring on trade unions the competence to manage the funds originating from such dismissals and by attributing to them the same function as that attributed to solidarist associations. Moreover, a Bill, which intends to put solidarist associations and trade unions on an equal footing by providing for the same minimum number of workers necessary to form these organizations, will soon be submitted to the legislative authority.

2. The right of trade union leaders to hold meetings on plantations

Following the visit by the ILO Regional Adviser for Standards with the aim of providing assistance to implement the steps taken by the Ministry of Labour to improve the labour law, a first version of a Ministerial Directive was drawn up. This text takes account of the requests made by the Committee of Experts in that a provision guarantees trade union leaders the right to hold meetings in workplaces, including on plantations. On 15 April 1993, the Minister signed a Directive which binds the labour administration authorities so as to guarantee to workers and their representatives the right to hold meetings in workplaces.

3. The right to strike of trade unions

The Government has supplied the text of the preliminary version of the Act on conditions of service of the public and civil services. Title VI of this text regulates strikes in public services by incorporating the doctrine of the Committee of Experts relating to the conditions in which strikes can be prohibited and restricted (sections 91, 92 and 93).

4. Prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in unions

The Government repeats that the prohibition in question originates from article 60 of the Constitution, which makes it difficult for the Government to make the required amendments.

5. Right to organize of workers in small agricultural and stock-raising enterprises

The Government states that since 30 November 1992, procedures have been initiated to repeal paragraph (c) of section 14 of the Labour Code. The Bill has been sent to the President of the Republic and its was decided to transmit this text to the ordinary session of Parliament that has just started.

Costa Rica. In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, expressed his profound respect for the supervisory machinery of the ILO and emphasized the importance he attached to the sending of reports, although in this particular case the Government's report had not been received for inexplicable reasons. In order to solve this problem it was appropriate to refer to the written information sent by his Government to the reports of November 1992 of the Regional Adviser for Standards and of the Advisory Mission on Labour Legislation undertaken in April 1992 by an ILO expert, as well as to the comments transmitted to his Government by the Labour Legislation Service of the ILO and by the ILO Office for Central America in May 1993. These documents showed the efforts made by his Government to comply with the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in the case concerning the legislation and practice on solidarist associations and their impact on the situation of trade union organizations. The Government had agreed to comply with these recommendations as well as with similar recommendations formulated by the Committee of Experts. To this end, the Government had made progress in two domains: on the one hand, the Government had started a tripartite consultation on matters which called for negotiations between the Government and organizations of employers and workers, and on the other hand, it had started bilateral negotiations with the trade unions on matters which required their agreement. The result was the submission to the Legislative Assembly of several Bills (of which the ILO had received copies which reflected the recommendations of the Committee of Experts in such a way as to make them effective under national legislation. The Committee of Experts had given an excellent definition of solidarist associations. This institution constituted part of the cultural and democratic tradition of Costa Rica where there was complete exercise of freedom. The Government representative urged the ILO to continue its support, assistance and advice in order to bring about a revision of labour law currently under discussion before the Legislative Assemby. He undertook to send on a regular basis reports containing detailed information on progress achieved to give full effect to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts so that his country could reach a situation which was in full conformity with international standards on freedom of association.

The Workers' members, while appreciating the considerable amount of written and oral information provided by the Government representative, felt that all this needed to be transferred into laws which in turn needed to be examined by the Committee of Experts. First of all, although they had no objections to any informal organization which promoted social harmony, they would however have objections if organizations such as solidarist associations replaced the traditional trade union functions and the employer functions in a country.

Referring to the information provided by the Government according to which there would be an amendment to the Act on solidarist associations which would specifically prohibit those associations from participating directly or indirectly in collective bargaining of an occupational nature, they stated that this would go some way towards satisfying their worries, if this was what the law was actually going to say. However, concern was expressed at the fact that a Bill was under way to put solidarist associations and trade unions on an equal footing. Therefore, further clarification was required on this aspect of the case. Regarding draft legislation to guarantee adequate protection against all forms of anti-union discrimination, the right of trade union leaders to hold meetings on plantations, the right to strike of trade unions and the right to organize of workers in small agricultural and stock-raising enterprises, the only way to ensure that these Bills were in conformity with the Convention was to submit them to the Committee of Experts for its examination. A problem arose regarding the prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in unions since the Government stated that the prohibition in question originated from article 60 of the Constitution, which made it difficult for the Government to make the required amendments. It was hoped that the Government would reconsider this point since foreigners who took a prominent part in trade union activities provided a fresh focus on trade union problems, as demonstrated in other countries.

The Employers' members also referred to the five aspects of this case. With respect to solidarist associations, these were unacceptable if they were supported and financed by the employers since they were no longer independent. Regarding the right of trade union leaders to hold meetings on plantations, it was pointed out that, although there had to be an opportunity for trade union representatives to meet either on a plantation or elsewhere, this right could not be construed from Convention No. 87. The same reasoning was applicable with respect to the right to strike of trade unions, whose interpretation by the Committee of Experts could not be construed from the Convention. However, the complete prohibition on foreigners from holding office in unions constituted interference in the internal affairs of a union as stated by the Experts, and the legislation had to be more flexible on this point. Finally, with respect to the right to organize of workers in small agricultural undertakings, which in fact concerned the larger question of the minimum number of members required to establish an organization, the Employers' members were of the view that this was a matter of concern for the organization only. In conclusion, the Employers' members associated themselves with the request from the Workers' members that there should be a detailed written report from the Government so that the Experts could analyse what changes had indeed taken place.

The Workers' member of Costa Rica refuted the arguments put forward by the Government representative by indicating that the Costa Rican Government regularly violated its obligation of sending reports, which was especially serious under Convention No.

87. The draft legislative text of the Government could turn out to be worse for the interests of workers than the actual situation. In such a case, his organization would not hesitate to lodge a new complaint of violation of freedom of association in Costa Rica before the competent supervisory bodies of the ILO. The legislative initiatives of the Government seemed to have the objective of putting solidarist associations on an equal footing with trade unions which could lead to an even more unfavourable situation. According to the draft text of the Government, solidarist associations would be recognized as "workers' organizations" designed to be of "public and social interest". This draft text should be drastically amended in order to comply with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. In particular, sanctions should be provided for against solidarist associations in cases where they exercised activities which were of the exclusive competence of trade unions. Regarding the right of trade union leaders to hold meetings on plantations, this situation did not require any legislative measure since the legal exercise of such a right in practice was guaranteed by the national Constitution as well as by the ratification of this Convention. Regarding the right to strike of trade union organizations in public services, he stressed that the draft legislative texts constituted a regression for employees in the public sector. The right to strike in Costa Rica was ridiculous and the notion of "public service" should be redefined. The prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in unions could without any inconvenience be lifted by a revision of the Constitution which would allow foreign workers to exercise their legitimate trade union rights. As for the right to organize of workers in small agricultural and stock-raising enterprises, he agreed with the Committee of Experts on the need to modify the legislation in force. Consequently, he urged the Government to send reports regularly on the application of the Convention and to ensure that these reports contained detailed and correct information on the conditions in which trade union rights were exercised in his country.

The Workers' member of Colombia indicated that this was a case of a flagrant violation of the Convention. The observation of the Committee of Experts revealed that in Costa Rica a sophisticated system was elaborated to eliminate the trade union movement, limiting the right to strike in the public sector, limiting the right to organize for certain categories of workers and imposing the solidarist associations to hamper the trade union movement. The draft laws presented by the Government did not offer sufficient guarantees because in many cases they represented a slip backwards for workers' rights, as was happening in other countries of Latin America with the latest reforms of labour laws. He referred to a case in March 1993 in which a representative of the Costa Rican workers, present at this session of the Conference, was dismissed from the Ministry of Education after having had his leave for union activities withdrawn. He urged the Committee of Experts to examine in depth the effects of solidarist associations and their negative impact on the trade union movement.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that the unions were not too opposed to the mutualist system, but that a clear distinction should be made between the activities of workers' organizations and those of mutual associations. He expressed a firm hope that the trade unions and the solidarist associations should be clearly differentiated in national legislation and in national practice. They could not be equally treated, in particular in defending the workers. The next missions from the Office to Costa Rica should ensure with clarity that the principles of tripartism and freedom of association were being upheld.

The Workers' member of Nicaragua stated that the opposition was not made to the solidarist associations but to the anti-trade union practices which derived from their activities. The establishment of solidarist associations had contributed to the disappearance of the most combative trade unions, in particular in the banana plantations. Moreover, the solidarist associations had also affected the existence of other unions. Solidarism was a practice of neo-liberalism which contributes to the destruction of trade unions in all the Central American area. The philosophy of solidarism was summarized by a Costa Rican entity as "The wolf dressed in the sheep skin", that is to say the trade unions were no longer necessary, that recourse to strikes was obsolete and that wages should be determined by the good will of the employers. The Office and the Committee of Experts should analyse seriously the experience of the solidarist system in other Central American countries, given the harmful effects on the trade unions in that area.

The Employers' member of Costa Rica stated that the employers' organizations were open to dialogue. The information transmitted by the Government clearly reflected the situation in his country. In the framework of the Superior Council of Labour, the problems treated in this case had been dealt with. The Government had made a compromise in October 1992 to the unions without consulting the employers' side which, in his opinion, went further than what was recommended by the ILO. In Costa Rica, there was the social peace, in the consolidated and stable democratic framework ensuring the education, housing, health and social security of the population. Solidarism was a movement authentically Costa Rican, regulated by a law which had been sanctioned by eminent national trade unionists. The workers could freely opt between the trade union and solidarism. Even though the strike was prohibited in the public service, strikes were exercised in the essential services – in the sectors of social security and of transport – without dismissal or sanctions. In Costa Rica there was no persecution of trade unions, on the contrary it had offered asylum to foreign trade unionists who could enjoy the climate of freedom in the country. The trade union movement was fragmented and divided by the lack of objectives for the workers' class – in contrast with the solidarist associations. This situation is not due to the State or to the employers. He regretted that the Government's report on the application of the Convention had not arrived in time, but hoped that the situation would soon be mitigated. He hoped that the next missions from the Office could assist in the revision of the labour legislation in the sense of recommendations of the Committee of Experts. In the meantime, the Conference Committee should take note with special interest of the major progress in the transformation and improvement of labour legislation which had taken place in his country.

The Workers' members stressed the relevance of the information provided by the Government that the legislation would be modified in accordance with the comments made by the Experts. They suggested that the contact with the ILO expected in July should be converted into a direct contacts mission. They hoped that the relevant legislation, whether in draft form or as enacted, would be submitted for a thorough examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members stressed that the issue was not about the word "solidarist" but about the fact that anti-trade union activities took place, such as associations being initiated and financed by employers and enjoying certain preferences laid down in the law. As regards the five points raised, they recalled that different views existed regarding the right to strike and the question of meetings of trade union leaders; on the other hand, they saw a clear violation of the Convention in the prohibition of foreign workers' involvement in unions and in the total prohibition of the right to form unions in small enterprises.

The Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, took note of the observations made by the members of the Conference Committee, and with particular interest of the statements by Workers' members. The Workers' members made valid and correct statements which highlighted the problem in its real dimension. He recalled that the draft legislation had been submitted to the Legislative Assembly for discussion and approval. These texts had been communicated to the Office and would be submitted to the Committee of Experts to be studied and their contents commented upon. The Government was in a position to uphold all the decisions that the social partners agreed upon in consensus both in the Superior Council of Labour – a tripartite body where these themes were discussed – and in the Legislative Assembly. What would not be accepted by the workers and employers would not be guaranteed as decisions. What could be improved should be improved, as had been stated by the Chairman of the Committee of Experts in his statement during the general discussion. He accepted the proposal by the Workers' members that the question should be treated by a direct contacts mission.

The Committee noted with interest the adherence expressed by the Minister of Labour to the supervisory system of the ILO. It also noted that the multidisciplinary teams would allow the improvement of dialogue between the Government and the supervisory organs. The Committee took note of the detailed written and oral information submitted by the Government representative in relation to the points which had been discussed for years, regretting nevertheless that the report supplied by the Government was not sent soon enough to be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee took note, with interest, of the information supplied by the Government according to which various Bills had been drawn up with the technical assistance of the ILO so as to bring the legislation more closely into conformity with the Convention. The Committee observed, nevertheless, that the Government was still not in a position to guarantee to foreign workers that they would have access to trade union office, at least not until they have fulfilled a certain residency period in the country, to meet the wishes of the Committee of Experts, since foreigners were not allowed to hold office or exercise authority in unions by virtue of the Political Constitution. The Committee hoped that the Committee of Experts would be able, in the very near future, to make a thorough assessment of the draft legislation drawn up in collaboration with the Office. Since these matters had been a cause for concern on the part of the Committee of Experts, the Committee trusted that it would be able to note decisive progress with regard to the whole of the law and practice as regards all the aspects outstanding in the very near future. As concerns in particular the solidarist associations, the Committee took note with special interest of the fact that the Government would take all the necessary measures to ensure that these associations did not take over trade union activities (including collective bargaining, through direct arrangements concluded between an employer and a non-unionized group of workers). The Committee also noted with interest that the Government had requested technical assistance from the Office and had no doubt that the Government would receive all the help it needed to resolve very rapidly the problems still outstanding. The Committee noted with interest the Government's statement to the effect that it was going to request a direct contacts mission in connection with the application of this Convention and, in particular, the question of solidarist associations. The Committee hoped that this mission would be able to take place in the very near future.

Cuba (ratification: 1952). The Government supplied the following information:

1. With regard to the comments of the Committee which appeared in this section of the observation, it was reiterated that the right of workers to form trade union organizations that they considered appropriate was governed by the provisions of section 13 of the Labour Code.

Concerning the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the interim conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, approved at the 254th Session of the Governing Body in November 1992, it was explained that the Government had sent the corresponding reply to these interim conclusions, and that they had been amended in accordance with the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, presented to the 256th Session of the Governing Body held in May 1993. In its reply, the Government included the letter dated 1 April 1992, sent by a citizen to the Ministry of Justice which was referred to by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the above-mentioned report, in which the said citizen decided to not pursue what he considered was an application to register an apparent trade union organization. In order to provide better details, it was stressed that no application to register and recognize any trade union organization had been made to the Ministry of Justice, and that the application referred to by the Committee on Freedom of Association was no more than a request for information concerning the Associations Act.

When the workers had considered it appropriate for the defence of their interests to form trade union organizations that were different from those already existing, they had met no opposition in the legislation or in practice, nor had they been required to wait for the authorization of any state organization, as provided for under section 13 of the Labour Code. As an example of this, already provided previously, recently the National Union of Science Workers was formed, joining together a total of 44,130 members, having 46 trade union offices, 592 trade union sections and 3,139 first-level leaders elected by direct and secret vote by those workers who carry out scientific activity. At the initiative of workers of this sector, its assembly was held and they adopted their regulations without the necessity of authorization by any State organization. This trade union and its leaders acted in accordance with their interests, without hindrance and with full authority and consideration before the workers that had elected them.

With regard to the reference to the Cuba Central Organization of Workers, when the Labour Code referred in general terms to the Central Organization of Workers, and not in specific terms, as would be the case if the Cuba Central Workers' Organization (CTC) was referred to, it was not done to institute a single trade union system. In Cuba there existed 18 National Trade Union Branches. The Cuba Central Organization of Workers was not established by the law; it was created voluntarily by workers in 1939 and responded to a tradition of unity of the Cuban labour movement which had its origin in the last century. Some of the amendments to the National Constitution already made known to the Committee of Experts were representative of the will of the Government to recognize the autonomy and independence of trade union organizations.

2. With regard to the comments in these paragraphs of the observation, the Government recalled that the independence and autonomy of trade union organizations was also recognized in section 15 of the Labour Code which provided that "Trade unions and the Central Workers' Organization which are joined voluntarily, are governed and function pursuant to the principles, rules and regulations which their members discuss and approve democratically". A worker representative of Cuba described in this Committee at a previous session the form in which workers elected their members, by secret and direct vote, and pursuant to the regulations and rules which had been adopted in the trade union assemblies. The Committee of Experts should not make observations to the Government concerning the content of the trade union rules and regulations, because these documents were the expression of the will of the workers made known and agreed upon democratically at trade union assemblies. The Committee of Experts should respect this will that formed part of the freedom enjoyed by workers and their trade unions, that adopted their own regulations without the interference of the Government.

Ecuador (ratification: 1967). The Government has supplied the following information:

As regards the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the increase of the minimum number of workers required for the establishment of occupational organizations (section 439 of the Labour Code), the reforms have not impaired the guarantees provided for by the Convention since the right to associate is effectively in force in this country. The Government states that, according to the information furnished by the Department of Occupational Organizations of the Ministry of Labour, 87 occupational organizations in total have been registered in the country between 21 November 1991 and 15 May 1993; there are 45 trade unions, 15 works councils, 24 associations and three federations.

As regards the decisions of the Ministry of Labour when there is disagreement between the parties on the minimum services to be provided in the event of a strike (unnumbered provision, inserted after section 503 of the Labour Code), this provision is in force since the promulgation of Act No. 133 revising the Labour Code of 21 November 1991. However, until now there has been no case where the labour authorities have had recourse to the exceptional possibility of establishing essential minimum services when a strike has been called in institutions which furnish services of public interest.

Regarding the follow-up to the draft amendments to the Labour Code which were prepared by an ILO mission in December 1989, the Government states that a request has once again been addressed to the current President of the National Congress to proceed immediately to the necessary steps concerning the adoption of these draft amendments in order to bring into full conformity Ecuadorian legislation with the international Conventions ratified by the country, by emphasizing the obligation undertaken by the Government before this Committee in June of last year. Together with the request, a file containing precedents and full information on this matter was also transmitted. A file containing documentation on the proposed draft amendments was transmitted to the chairman of the Standing Legislative Committee on Labour and Social Matters. In his response, the president of the National Congress stated that he had requested the secretariat to take the necessary steps so that the plenary sessions of the committees could deal with the said draft amendments. Finally, on this occasion, the Government reiterates its decision to bring its national legislation fully into line with the international obligations to which it has subscribed.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Human Resources, first indicated that his Government had come to power only in August 1992, but that since then it had been engaged in examining the questions which were the subject of the Committee of Experts' comments. In this regard, the affair had been brought before Parliament by the communication of 27 April 1993 so that the draft laws of 1990 relating to Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 105 and 111 could be examined by the latter. In addition, the Government had drawn the attention of Parliament to the urgency of approving the above-mentioned draft laws. Concerning these drafts, he stated that the Government had done all in its power to persuade the majority of the Members of Parliament to vote in favour of the adoption of the proposed reforms, but the final result was uncertain since the Government did not have the majority in the heterogeneous Congress composed of 17 political parties. As for the question of increasing the minimum number for the establishment of a trade union to 30, he stressed, on one hand, that the same legal requirement of a minimum number of workers to form unions existed in other member States of the Andean Pact (Peru, Bolivia and Venezuela – 20, and Colombia – 25) and, on the other hand, that this Convention did not specify a minimum number in this regard. In any case, unions continued to be formed normally since the legislative reform of 1991; a total of 87 unions had been legally established between November 1991 and 15 May 1993. The Committee of Experts considered, however, that the minimum number of 30 workers, which could be admissible in the case of sectoral trade unions, should be reduced for enterprise unions. The Government found this suggestion problematic and had not studied it because it would not be easy to determine what were sectoral trade unions and enterprise unions. Regarding minimum services in the event of a strike, the Government recalled that the legislative reform of 1991 had established a procedure on this matter and that the subject of the above comments was this procedure and not the minimum of 20 per cent of workers required for such services. He specified that the above procedure consisted of the obligation on the parties concerned to agree, during the 48 hours after notice of the strike to the employer, upon the modalities of minimum services in the services considered to be essential, and in the absence of agreement, of the fixation of such modalities by the President of the Conciliation and Arbitration Tribunal, a tripartite organ, since the President was the Director or Sub-director of Labour. The Government did not understand why the ILO's supervisory bodies could object to the establishment of this procedure while it recognized the right to ban or to limit strikes in essential public services. In practice, the power in question had not been exercised since the entry into force of the revision of the Labour Code, to establish the modalities of minimum services by the intermediary of the authorities. He reiterated the determination of his Government to find solutions for the problems raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members remarked on the length of time during which the case had been outstanding and the similarity of the Government's statement to that made in 1992 and expressed doubt about the Government's intention to make the necessary changes. As for the minimum number of workers for the establishment of trade unions, they stated it was not for the Government to try and avoid multiplicity of unions. Regarding minimum services in the event of a strike, the relevant legislation concerning the independent body that determined such services should be examined by the Committee of Experts. They were disappointed to see no positive action taken in view of all the discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention. They requested that copies of the draft laws mentioned by the Government be sent to the Office.

The Employers' members remarked that the Convention did not set forth criteria on the minimum number of workers for the establishment of trade unions or of works councils, and that the principle should be the freedom of association. Concerning strikes, they considered that the Committee of Experts' comments on the relation between Article 8, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention needed more nuance. They welcomed the Committee of Experts' recognition of possibilities of restricting or prohibiting strikes in essential services which, in their opinion, should be determined by social partners or an appropriate forum of the country. They agreed with the statement of the Workers' members' that various discrepancies existed and hoped for a detailed report from the Government for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of France wondered about the aim of setting a minimum number of workers for establishing trade unions. He considered that the requirement of minimum percentage of essential services hindered the right to strike, and expressed doubt about the Government's intention for changes.

The Workers' member of Greece recalled that the amendments to the Labour Code by Act No. 133 had been considered by the Workers' member of Ecuador at the 1992 Committee as a step backwards. He requested precisions on the reform concerning the five points raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Colombia pointed out the danger of leaving the definition of essential services unspecified in the legislation and thus to the discretion of the Government. He wanted further information on the precise contents of the draft legislation.

The Government representative provided some additional information on certain points raised by the Committee of Experts. He emphasized the right of the workers in the public sector to form and join trade unions of their own choosing, as well as to negotiate freely. His Government only made limitations on certain exaggerated aspirations which would have the consequence of reducing the financial resources of the State entities so that they would no longer be in a position to discharge their functions of public service. However, it had never been the case of interference in the right of workers to organize freely and to bargain collectively. Another aspect was the penalty of imprisonment for the instigators of collective work stoppages and illegal strikes, i.e. when public services were totally stopped. As to the requirement that members of the executive committees of works councils be Ecuadorian, he specified that this traditional requirement in Ecuador could be derogated when a situation of reciprocity existed with another country. Concerning the dissolution of works councils, section 461 of the Labour Code concerned only the cases of works councils whose membership dropped below 25 per cent of the total number of workers. In the other cases, only a judicial decision could dissolve a union. He stated that his Government had so far not dissolved any works council administratively and that the proposed reforms covered this subject. Trade unions that consisted of fewer than 30 members but more than 15 as required by the previous legislation could continue exercising their activities, since the new Act was not retroactive. Regarding the prohibition on unions from taking part in religious or political activities, this prohibition was meant to guarantee the freedom of political opinion and of religion, namely that the workers should not be obliged to share a political opinion or a belief in order to affiliate to a trade union or to exercise union activities. Otherwise, trade unions were not prohibited from expressing themselves on points of general politics. He reaffirmed his Government's commitment to resolving the outstanding problems and emphasized the Government's efforts to have the draft laws, which were elaborated with the assistance of an expert mission from the ILO, approved by Parliament. In this regard, the Government wished to count on the support of Ecuadorian workers. He stressed that all the relevant information and the draft texts proposed since 1990 had been communicated to the ILO.

The Workers' member of Ecuador stated that the draft laws to follow up the comments of the Committee of Experts were still with the Congress and that the trade unions supported any law that was favourable to the situation of workers. He further added that Law No. 133 had been challenged as unconstitutional in court. Finally, he requested that measures be taken to remove obstacles in the formation of trade unions. These obstacles were caused by some officials and their bias in conflict during social conflicts.

The Committee noted the very detailed written and oral information provided by the Minister of Labour and Human Resources according to which the Government was committed to adopting the draft law revising the Labour Code prepared in cooperation with a technical mission of the ILO in 1989 and the assistance of the Regional Adviser on Standards, and to bringing its legislation into full conformity with its international obligations. The Committee recalled that the serious discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention had been the subject of many discussions in the past and its conclusions had been contained in special paragraphs of its report. The Committee regretted that the Government had not yet adopted the appropriate measures to ensure the application of this fundamental Convention, ratified 25 years ago, and once again urged the Government to communicate a copy of the amendments to the Labour Code as soon as they were adopted. The Committee expressed the hope that it would be in a position to note, in the very near future, progress made with regard to the whole of the legislation.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). A Government representative recalled the institutional events of May 1993 which had led to a change of government. The resignation of the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare prevented a reply being sent in time to the observation made by the Committee of Experts. The new President of the Republic was a defender of civil liberties and his election was made possible with the general agreement of all the political tendencies and with the support of the workers and the employers. He assured the Committee that the Government's comments on the Committee of Experts' observations would be submitted to the Office.

The Workers' members welcomed the information concerning the recent political developments and expressed the hope that the consolidation of the democratic system would allow for favourable developments to take place in the social domain. This Committee had already dealt with this case many times. It had been the subject of a special paragraph in its 1985 report and had also been discussed at length in 1991. While noting certain improvements, the observation of the Committee of Experts showed that the more important problems remained and listed the discrepancies that existed. Moreover, the observation pointed out that new problems had appeared with respect to the Convention resulting from new provisions of the Labour Code imposing new obligations, such as the sworn statement that was required from members of the executive committee of a trade union to the effect that they had no criminal record. A serious situation of violence and insecurity persisted in the country where trade unionists were threatened with murder or abduction, or just disappeared, with the participation of the army and death squads. In the context of a difficult transition towards democracy, this Committee had to remain firm in its demand for total and unconditional respect of freedom of association and had to ask the new Government to give effect quickly to the observations of the Committee of Experts by taking the measures that were necessary.

The Employers' members pointed out that although the legislation dating from 1992 had given rise to certain problems, as pointed out by the Committee of Experts in their report, there had been positive developments. Each discrepancy between the legislation and the Convention had been listed individually by the Experts. The Employers' members agreed completely with most of these points on which they felt some amendment to the legislation was required. However, they did not agree with the Committee of Experts' interpretation of the precise requirements with regard to the right to strike, which in their view could not be construed from the Convention in such specific terms. With regard to the recent political events, although it had been a very turbulent period in Guatemala, there was a new President who had said that he stood for the respect of human rights. They trusted that a comprehensive report would be sent by the Government in the future which would contain information on changes in line with the request made by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Guatemala indicated that the violations of freedom of association had only deteriorated until the events of May 1993 but that he hoped that the situation would improve in this domain, and in particular that this Convention would be fully respected. A tripartite agreement had allowed for the adoption in November 1992 of a law introducing major amendments to the Labour Code on several points. However, these reforms would be insufficient if the political will and decision to understand, to respect and to ensure respect of national legislation as well as of international labour standards on freedom of association was lacking.

The Employers' member of Guatemala emphasized the importance of the reform of the Labour Code described by the previous speaker. These amendments were the result of a tripartite dialogue aimed at adapting the provisions of the national legislation to the Convention. These amendments were very far-reaching, which recognized the impossibility of dismissing all the members of a union in the process of being established, reduced the number of workers required to establish a trade union and streamlined the procedures pertaining to the establishment of a trade union. With regard to the restrictions raised in the Committee of Experts' observation, it would be appropriate to ignore them given that most of them did not exist in practice. The provisions of the Labour Code mentioned by the Committee of Experts were not applied and there were no means of ensuring their respect. The Courts had not rendered any decision on the basis of these provisions of the Labour Code which remained a dead letter. At that time the situation Guatemala was very different from that which prevailed a decade ago. Important progress had been made which favoured dialogue and good tripartite understanding.

The Workers' member of Germany also welcomed the new political conditions which prevailed in the country but stated that he could not agree with the Employers' member of Guatemala who considered that there were no difficulties. With regard to this Convention in particular, the Committee on Freedom of Association in a recent report had expressed its serious concern and had clearly shown how the different provisions were not respected by the Government.

The Workers' member of Guatemala, although not denying the merits of the amendments introduced to the Labour Code in November 1992, once again stated that its application had to be ensured. Agricultural workers who wished to establish organizations of rural workers were accused of being subversive or guerrillas. In June and October 1992, secretary-generals of trade unions had "accidents", of which one was fatal. This meant that attention had to be paid to the manner in which trade union rights could be exercised in practice in the future.

The Government representative stated that she had taken due note of the observations of the speakers and assured this Committee that the next report due on the application of the Convention would contain all the comments that her Government would wish to formulate on this matter.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative on the institutional situation in her country. The Committee expressed the hope that it would soon be possible to eliminate the discrepancies between national legislation and practice on the one hand, and the Convention on the other hand, a matter which had already been discussed many times and which had been the subject of special paragraphs in previous reports. The Committee strongly urged the Government to adopt in the near future the necessary measures so as to bring to an end the very serious breaches of freedom of association that had been taking pla one of those problems. In the 1960s, when fire-fighters began to organize, this question arose and the Government took a low profile with regard to the first comments made by the Committee of Experts.

Japan (ratification: 1965). A Government representative stated that since 1990 periodic consultations between the responsible ministries and the All- Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) had been taking place and that a decision had been taken to find a solution to the problem of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel within a period of two years. Frequent discussions recently took place involving concrete solutions and procedural matters. Important efforts had also been made to gain a wider understanding of the problems involved and to be able to transmit to Parliament and to the trade unions the necessary information. Despite all efforts and consultations, solutions, approved by all parties concerned, to resolve the problem with a long history behind it and affecting a large number of people had not been found. The Government nevertheless continued to make all possible efforts not to interrupt the ongoing negotiations. It expected the adoption of various measures and a more frequent exchange of information between the parties concerned in the ILO. To the extent possible it would be providing the ILO with all the available information.

The Workers' member of described the historical context of the problem involved. The Convention had been ratified by in 1965 with the help of the good offices of the ILO but not without problems. However, the problem of fire-fighting personnel was not one of those problems. In the 1960s, when fire-fighters began to organize, this question arose and the Government took a low profile with regard to the first comments made by the Committee of Experts. The Government even expressed the wish to resolve the problem so as to avoid discussion in the ILO. Then, in the early 1980s, the Government adopted a more aggressive attitude and challenged the comments of the Experts. In the past few years, however, it began to recognize the importance of finding a solution and today further new events and elements in this respect could be noted. He noted nevertheless that the period of two years from June 1991, during which the trade union leaders and responsible authorities had agreed to find a solution, had expired. It was important to note that, after 21 years, meetings of some significance were now taking place. It was nevertheless clear now that this problem could not be resolved by mere consultations and that a draft law needed to be submitted to Parliament. He recalled that the trade unions of his country have given up the right to strike of fire-fighting personnel because they provided an essential service of public safety. He stressed, however, their readiness to reach any compromise of a transitional nature for trial periods regarding the freedom of association of these personnel in consultation with the Government.

The Workers' members welcomed and commended the constructive and positive remarks made by the Government representative which sharply contrasted with those of previous years. They noted the progress made in the 11 meetings that had taken place in the past two years referred to by the Government representative. They drew the Committee's attention to article 28 of the Constitution of which, in their view, presented no problem for the enactment of laws with respect to ratified Conventions. They invited the Government representative to provide this Committee with more details on the 11 meetings including the problems encountered and solutions provided. They requested the Government representative to confirm whether any possible ILO collaboration and assistance on the question of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel had been consented to by the Government.

The Government representative stated that, while closely and fully cooperating with the ILO, his Government wished to invite the concerned ILO officials to come to for them to have contact with the responsible people in and to obtain information directly with a view to finding real solutions to the problem. He also stated his Government's formal acceptance of the cooperation of the ILO as one of the possible ways of resolving the problem.

The Workers' members noted the Government's readiness to seek the ILO's collaboration and assistance on this question and considered that what they had heard would go a long way towards improving understanding in ensuring the desired results in .

The Employers' members considered that the Government representative had provided information of great importance. With regard to the substance of the problem, they noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association had already clearly stated that fire-fighting personnel did not form part of the police, while the Committee of Experts and this Committee had not decided on this question. Neither had the Government done so, because this Committee had at its disposal now much information regarding the formal aspects of the problem as well as the procedural progress made, but not on all the results of these procedures. In view of the level of intensity attained in the discussions and in view of the Government's commitment to finding a solution, the Employers' members considered that it was now necessary to seek solutions to the problem. In this respect, they recalled the other cases that could not find solutions for long periods of time but which had been rapidly and positively resolved following consultations. They hoped that solutions would soon be found in the current case and that the Government would keep the ILO informed of developments. With regard to the second point raised by the Committee of Experts concerning the prohibition of the right to strike of public servants, the Employers' members expressed the wish that it should not be included in the conclusions of this Committee given that the Government representative and the Workers' member of had not referred to it.

The Worker's member of Pakistan supported the statements made by the Worker's member of and the Workers' members. He referred to Article 9 of the Convention and hoped that consultations with the ILO would obtain positive results with regard to the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel and further referred to the question of the right to strike mentioned by the Employers' members. He stressed this Committee's and the Committee of Experts' position that public servants should have recourse to a jurisdiction where they could present their grievances or settle their disputes. He hoped the consultations and positive results referred to by the Government representative would bring the legislation of the most industrialized country in Asia into conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

A Government member of Germany also recalled that in earlier cases this Committee had repeatedly called upon the parties concerned to find solutions through negotiations and such appeals had produced results. He welcomed the fact that in the present case all the parties recognized the great progress made and the substantive negotiations taking place after 21 years of silence. He considered that this Committee should take due note of this fact and welcome this development which constituted a hopeful and encouraging sign for the continuation of the consultations with a view to finding solutions. He stressed that his remarks only concerned the first point raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands welcomed the discussions regarding the first points mentioned by the Committee of Experts on the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel. This Committee could afford to be optimistic even if it had to wait to see if the Government would honour its undertakings. With regard to the prohibition of the right to strike of public servants, he regretted the failure on the part of the Government to provide any information despite the fact that the Experts had specifically requested such information. He further felt that discussions should also take place concerning this question. He requested the Government representative to indicate if such discussions were taking place on this question in the country and if any progress could be expected soon. The speaker further considered that it was necessary to clarify the question of essential services in general.

The Workers' member of Italy referred to the Italian experience in this respect. The contradictions between the public interest and the interests of workers regarding the right to strike of public servants had been reconciled after long discussions between the trade unions and the public authorities, and the results had been included in the text of a law.

The Government representative stated that, to the extent possible, his Government would provide the requested information with regard to the right to strike of public servants to the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took due note of the oral information provided by the Government representative as well as the discussion that had taken place in this Committee. It recalled that the Committee of Experts, as well as this Committee, had been drawing the Government's attention for some years to the discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention, particularly concerning the denial of the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel. The Committee noted that since 1990, 11 consultations between the Government and the All- Prefectural Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) had taken place. The Committee noted, however, that for some years the Government had stated to the Conference Committee that consultations were going on in this respect but no concrete measures had yet been taken to ensure the full application of the Convention ratified in 1965. The Committee once again expressed the firm hope that the consultations taking place at the national level with the representative organizations would make it possible in a very short time to bring the whole legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee noted with great interest the statement of the Government representative that the Government wished to cooperate and have consultations with the ILO and in particular its wish to invite those in the ILO handling this matter regarding the right to organize of fire-fighting personnel to visit and to assess the situation de visu and in situ. The Committee hoped that the Office would be able to provide technical assistance in the form requested and that the Government would in its next report be able to communicate the concrete progress made concerning the application of this fundamental Convention.

Mauritania (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stressed that the Constitution of 20 July 1991 guaranteed to all citizens the right of association and the right to join any political or trade union organization of their choice. As was the case for other public liberties, freedom of association had to be regulated by legislation setting out the conditions required for trade unions to establish themselves and to function. To this end, and without even waiting for the revision of the Labour Code undertaken with ILO assistance to be completed, a draft law had been prepared which would repeal all the provisions restricting trade union pluralism and recognized unequivocally the trade union rights contained in the Convention. The final draft could be submitted to Parliament at the end of the year, once it had been examined by an ILO expert. This showed the Government's intention to bring its legislation into conformity with international labour standards and its readiness, as noted by the direct contacts mission of April 1992, to work towards this end in collaboration with the Office.

The Workers' members recalled that in this case comments had been made for several years on the need to amend the legislation to allow trade union pluralism. In its observation the Committee of Experts noted the assurances given by the Government in this respect during the direct contacts mission in May 1992. The Government representative confirmed this intention to go ahead with the necessary amendments to the legislation. However, this represented a backward slide because although the Committee of Experts had indicated that the adoption of the draft law was planned for April 1993, the Government representative had now promised that this would take place at the end of the current year. The Workers' members could only subscribe to the hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that the Government would take all the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. It was moreover indispensable that the Office be kept informed of any developments in the situation by full and detailed reports.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the requests made by the Workers' members. However, they made a distinction between the two points raised by the Committee of Experts. With regard to the amendments that needed to be made to the legislation to make trade union pluralism possible, it was clear that they were indispensable to bring the situation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee of Experts was also asking for amendments to the legislation in respect of the restrictions on the right to strike. Given their stance on the interpretation by the Committee of Experts of the right to strike, and in the absence of information on what the restrictions were in this case, the Employers' members reserved their position on the second point.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the remarks made. The delay in the adoption of the new legislation was due to technical difficulties but the political intentions of the Government could not be doubted. The existence of a free press and of several political parties was a reflection of its commitment to pluralism. With the help of the Office, these developments should also have an impact on trade unionism towards the end of the year.

The Committee noted the oral information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee observed with concern that the adoption of the new labour legislation, in conformity with the Convention, had been delayed. The Committee strongly urged the Government to ensure that the necessary measures were taken in the very near future to ensure that all workers and all employers could establish and join occupational organizations outside the existing trade union structure, if they so wished. The Committee noted with interest the request for technical assistance made by the Government representative with a view to enabling this draft legislation to be adopted before the end of 1993. The Committee hoped to be able to note in the near future significant progress in the application of this fundamental Convention, and requested the Government to supply detailed information in this respect in its next report.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). A Government representative first referred to the oral and written communications which the Government had provided to this Committee in 1992, and added that a National Convention composed of some 700 delegates, including elected representatives as well as representatives of the political parties, the national races, civil servants, workers, peasants, the intelligentsia and other invited persons had been convened and started on 9 January 1993. The purpose of the National Convention was to lay down the basic principles of a new Constitution that would ensure fundamental rights, including those of workers. After the emergence of the new Constitution, various laws would have to be reviewed so as to be brought into line with it. However, during the transitional period the workers' rights were being ensured by the legislation still in force. At the same time, labour laws reflecting the democratic principles pertaining to workers had been drafted. He stated that new labour laws reflecting the principles of the Convention, to which the Government had referred in last year's report, and which replaced old ones concerning the formation of workers' organizations, had been submitted to the appropriate authorities and were now under consideration. His Government would inform the ILO in due course of progress in the framing of the new Constitution and the new labour laws.

The Workers' members, after expressing their wish to discuss this Convention regarding Myanmar next year, pointed out that this was a long-standing case and recalled that a Government representative had mentioned two years ago the "drastic" change from socialism to multi-party democracy which had taken place in 1988. They thought that the people of Myanmar had been "freed" from the single-party system into a system under martial law.

where human rights violations, such as murder, torture, imprisonment and forced labour, were tolerated and perhaps even sanctioned. They noted that the Government representative's statement did not differ from the statement at the Committee in 1992 regarding the drafting of the Constitution and the redrafting of the Trade Union Act. They were of the opinion that there was no freedom of association in the country or hardly any trade union movement; trade unionists who criticized the Government were imprisoned, the Members of Parliament elected in May 1990 had not been allowed to convene, many of whom were in prison, disqualified or had fled the country. In view of the seriousness of the case and the fact that no progress had been made since 1989 and that there was no commitment to the required changes, the Workers' members proposed to mention the case in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Employers' members pointed out that the subject here was the legislation of 1976 which provided for a monopoly of trade union rights and the corresponding practice, which both represented a clear infringement of the Convention. They also recalled that the case had been discussed for a long time and that the Government representative had repeated that the country was in the process of transition and of revising the legislation. They considered such a comment too general and too weak in light of the gravity of the situation. They were of the opinion that more specific commitment to changing not only the legislation but also the practice was needed. Given the little progress made in the length of time, the Employers' members agreed to the proposal of recourse to a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of the United States emphasized the urgency of the case, referring to the violation of human and trade union rights in the country including arrests of labour activists. He expressed concern about the ideas of some Asian countries that economic development should precede the development of human and trade union rights. He noted that despite the difficult circumstances a free union was operating in those areas where government control was weak, and clandestinely in other areas. He supported the call for a special paragraph in view of the serious situation.

The Workers' member of pointed out that the Workers' representative of Myanmar to the present Conference was a "supervisor" and not a trade union representative. He noted that no progress had been made despite the repeated assurances by the Government, and he supported the inclusion of this case in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Pakistan agreed with the previous speakers in noting little progress and in requesting a special paragraph. He urged that the Government should inform the Office of any developments in this matter.

The Government representative first denied that workers were arrested or tortured for trade union activities. He stated that the so-called trade union operating on the border areas was a creation of terrorist groups outside the territory of Myanmar and did not represent any worker in Myanmar. He repeated that the transitional process to a democratic multi-party system and the abolition of the monopoly of trade unions was taking time and preparation. He was opposed to the allegation that elected representatives were imprisoned and stressed that the drafting of the Constitution was going ahead. He repeated that the single trade union no longer existed and that steps had been taken to adopt legislation which would take into account the principles of freedom of association.

The Committee took note of the information repeated by the Government representative according to which his Government was committed to a process of change in the country's legislation in order to guarantee trade union rights. Nevertheless, the Committee recalled that the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee had indicated to the Government, over a period of several years, the provisions of the legislation requiring amendment and up to now these changes in the legislation had not been made. Consequently, the Committee expressed its deep concern and firmly urged the Government to adopt, in the very near future, the necessary measures in legislation and practice to guarantee to all workers and all employers without any distinction and without prior authorization the right to organize even outside the existing trade union structure should they so wish. The Committee trusted that it would be able to take note of substantial progress in the application of the Convention and requested the Government to transmit relevant detailed information in its next report. The Committee decided to include this case in a special paragraph of its General Report.

Pakistan (ratification: 1951). A Government representative emphasized that his Government was fully aware of its responsibilities and committed to fulfil its obligations under ratified Conventions. The Government attached great importance to the Convention and admitted the discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention on various points. The Government had, therefore, decided to set up a commission to review and recodify all the labour laws in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention. Due to the changes in the Government, the proposal for the review commission was still pending. He indicated that the ILO had been approached with a request to provide an expert to advise this review commission, but that there had been a delay due to the names proposed by the ILO. The Government had expressed its desire that the expert be from the Asian region. As concerned the various issues raised by the Committee of Experts, he indicated that the question of restoration of trade union rights to employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation and the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation was on the agenda of the Cabinet and that a decision would be taken soon. Again, due to the change in Government, a slight delay had occurred. The Cabinet had set up a special committee to review the situation of employees in export processing zones and to make recommendations to the Government. This matter had also been challenged in the courts and the Government was awaiting the judgement in order to take remedial measures in the light of the decision. He reiterated that public servants of Grade 16 and above did not fall within the purview of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, but indicated that the officers were allowed to form associations to protect their rights. Information on the size and activities of these associations would be collected and provided to the ILO in the Government's next report. As concerned the Schedule to the Industrial Relations Ordinance which set out the public utility services in which strikes were prohibited, he reiterated his Government's view that disruption of any of these services was likely to endanger the health and safety of society as a whole. Consideration had not, therefore, been given to amending the Schedule, but this matter would also be reviewed by the proposed commission. He reiterated his Government's position that granting the right of representation to minority unions would severely undermine the importance of the elected representatives. The workers were against such a move. The minority unions could misuse the right to dialogue in order to advocate their own interests instead of representing their own members. This issue would also be the subject of review by the commission. Finally, he indicated that, while trade unions could not be formed in private and public sector hospitals, employees of hospitals had formed associations and were able to act in a wide range of ways for the defence of their members' rights. Again, this issue would be reviewed by the commission.

The Workers' members noted that this case had been discussed in this Committee in the past and that it had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1987. They noted that the Committee of Experts had to examine once again the same seven points which had been the subject of discussions in this Committee. Given the lack of information provided and the lack of progress indicated on certain points, the Workers' members wished to deal with the matters concerning the denial of the right to form trade unions and to place emphasis on developments with respect to the denial of workers' rights in export processing zones. With respect to the denial of the right to form trade unions, they recalled that the Government seemed agreeable to eliminating restrictions on the employees of the Pakistan Television Corporation, the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation and the public sector and private sector hospitals. Nevertheless, the situation had not changed and they expressed their concern in this regard. As for the export processing zones, the Workers' members emphasized that, not only were trade union rights affected, but the Finance Act adopted in 1992 permitted the exclusion of workers in the recently created special industrialized zones from the application of the labour legislation. They indicated that the exclusion of the application of standards from certain sectors was contrary to the principle of universality of international law and could not be justified by economic considerations. The Workers' members urged that the necessary political changes take place so that the practice could be brought into conformity with the Convention and requested that the conclusions on this case be placed in a special paragraph. Furthermore, they regretted that the Government's request for ILO technical assistance had not come to pass due to the conditions imposed by the Government.

The Employers' members recalled the long history of this case and the fact that it had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1987. While in 1992 the Committee had thought that the situation was beginning to improve, this year they could only express their disappointment. In 1992 the Government had made a point of stating it was going to request technical assistance, but this had not taken place. Now, the Government was talking about establishing special commissions, but no concrete actions could be noted. They indicated that the lack of action taken by the Government left the impression that there was a certain amount of bad faith on its part. As concerned trade union rights for employees of the Pakistan Television and Broadcasting Corporations, they noted that the Government had indicated in previous years that these rights had inadvertently been omitted from the legislation and that interministerial consultations would resolve the matter. It now appeared that the proposed commission was going to take up the issue. It seemed that no progress was being made on this question. The issue of trade union rights in export processing zones was the subject of ongoing analysis by the Committee of Experts and the technical assistance of the Office requested by the Government would probably help clarify the situation. They also considered that the Government could benefit from ILO technical assistance on the comments raised with respect to the right of representation of minority unions. The Employers' members indicated their surprise at the Government representative's statement that associations of high-level public servants could be formed, since this issue had been of great concern to the Government in past years. They requested the Government to indicate the law which permitted such associations to be formed. As for the right to strike, they recalled that they considered the definition of essential services adopted by the Committee of Experts to be too narrow. The determination that railways and public utilities were not essential services did not, in their view, take into account the level of industrial development of a country and other considerations. They urged that the Committee of Experts give consideration to greater flexibility in this matter. As concerned the promotion of workers to supervisory positions for the purpose of undermining unions, they recalled that it had been indicated in 1992 that a procedure for unfair labour practices existed and they had hoped to be provided with some data on how it worked in practice. This was yet another disappointment which raised some questions as to whether there was indeed good faith on the part of the Government. Finally, they recalled that, in 1992, the Government had expressed its concern about hospital employees being permitted to form trade unions because this would lead to strikes in this essential service. Now the Government was saying that these workers had the right to form associations. The facts were not clear. This was all the more reason for ILO technical assistance to be provided to the Government in order to resolve expeditiously the difficulties in complying with the provisions of the Convention.

A Workers' member of associated himself with the statement made by the Workers' members. Restricting his comments to the question of the denial of trade union rights in export processing zones, he recalled that such zones were becoming synonymous with the notion of zones free of trade unions. Many governments considered the ban on trade unions as an incentive to attract foreign investment. As concerned the exclusion of certain workers from the guarantees of the Convention, he insisted that such exclusions were inadmissible and recalled that the Convention applied to all workers whether in the private or in the public sector. The only possible exception which could be made by governments was with respect to the police and the armed forces.

A Workers' member of Senegal emphasized the problem of export processing zones raised in this case and drew attention to the risks of other countries falling into the same situation because of the pressures brought to bear by funding agencies, which imposed changes to the labour legislation or the prohibition of collective agreements on minimum wages, or because of the unfair competition of products exported by countries where labour standards were ignored. He firmly supported the proposal of the Workers' members to mention this case in a special paragraph.

The Government representative repeated that his Government was fully cooperating with the ILO and that no conditions had been placed on the technical assistance, nor had it been refused. The Government had merely suggested that an expert from the Asian region would be welcome. He stated that, while the case had been long outstanding, there had been definite improvements. The Government was now going to set up a commission to examine all the issues and make recommendations. In reply to the question from the Employers' members as to which law now permitted certain workers, who did not previously have the right to organize, to create associations, he stated that the Constitution guaranteed freedom of association to all persons. The only difference was that workers falling within the scope of the Industrial Relations Ordinance could register. The associations mentioned, although not registered, could act in the defence of their members' rights, but in general, could not call strikes. In reality, however, many of these associations actually went on strike without interference from the Government. He recalled that the ban on the Pakistan Airline employees had been lifted and they had now formed a union. The case of the Pakistan Television Corporation should also have been resolved, but for the delays due to the change in Government. He assured the Committee that they were on the right path and that the case would certainly improve.

The representative of the Secretary-General referred to the offer of a technical assistance mission which had been brought up during the discussion of this case. He indicated that the Office had provided the Government with the names of four experts for this mission from Europe, Africa and Asia, lawyers of high standing, including two members of the Committee of Experts. He stated that the Director-General alone was responsible for designating independent experts to carry out missions in his name. The national sensitivities expressed by the Government had led, exceptionally, to the proposal of four names, none of which had been accepted. If this mission did not take place, it was not due to any absence of good faith, diligence or sensitivity on the part of the Office. He reiterated that the Standards Department remained at the Government's disposal so that an expert, chosen according to the above conditions, could undertake a mission to the country when the Government so wished. The Government representative indicated that he was not aware of the procedure used by the Office. He stated that the Government was under the impression that the panel of names would be given to them and that they could choose one. If, however, the decision was within the Director-General's competence, the Government would accept his decision in this matter. He assured the full cooperation of his Government.

The Committee noted the oral information supplied by the Government representative as well as the debate which had taken place. The Committee recalled with concern the fact that this case had been discussed many times in respect of the discrepancies between national law and practice and the Convention with regard to, in particular, the ban on trade union membership for many categories of workers both in private and public sectors, the granting of false promotions to employees in order to remove them from the category of employees which enjoyed the right to organize, as well as the question of workers in export processing zones. The Committee recalled that its conclusions had been mentioned in a special paragraph in previous reports. It expressed its concern at the new restrictive measures taken and once again urged the Government to reconsider its position with a view to amending its legislation and practice in order to bring them fully into line with this fundamental Convention ratified in 1951. The Committee recalled that technical assistance from the Office was available and expressed the firm hope that it would be possible to note progress in a very short time. The Committee requested the Government to supply detailed information on any measures adopted or contemplated in this connection in its next report. The Workers' members recalled that they had requested a special paragraph for this case.

The Employers' members suggested that, in light of the Government's indication with respect to technical assistance, it would not be appropriate to deal with this case in a special paragraph this year. They stressed, however, that they expected concrete progress to be made in the coming year and if this were not the case, then it might be necessary to come back to this question in the future.

The Government member of Sri Lanka also suggested that a special paragraph was not desirable in view of the indications given by the Government representative that every endeavour would be made to improve the situation and that technical assistance would be sought.

The Workers' members, while expressing their understanding for the position expressed by the Employers' members, recalled that promises to improve the situation with the assistance of the ILO had been made by the Government already in 1992, yet no real steps had been taken and the same promises were being made now. They accepted the decision not to raise this case in a special paragraph this year, on the understanding that if there was no concrete progress to report next year, then the case would be dealt with in a special paragraph at that time.

Paraguay (ratification: 1962). The Government has supplied the following information:

There are no special or distinct legislative or regulatory provisions applicable to the constitution of workers' organizations on the one hand, and of employers' organizations on the other hand. Section 95 of the current National Constitution on freedom of association states that all public and private sector workers have the right to organize in trade unions without the necessity of prior authorization. Members of the Armed Forces and the police are excluded from this right. Employers have the right to the same freedom of association. No one can be forced to belong to a trade union.

Section 290 of the Labour Code provides that the following persons can constitute executive committees of unions: (a) persons over 18 years old without distinction based on sex, be they citizens or foreigners; (b) persons over 14 years and under 18 years old, with the express permission of their legal representative, clarifying that such young persons cannot participate in the direction or the administration of the union; and (c) foreigners of good conduct and good character who have resided for more than five years in the country. Section 366 of the Labour Code, Chapter 2, provides that a "lockout" or a "closure" means the partial or total temporary suspension of work at the initiative of the employers in the event of disputes with workers, for the direct and exclusive defence of their occupational interests.

Section 97 of the current National Constitution refers to the right to strike and lockout. It provides for the following with respect to collective agreements: unions have the right to carry out collective action and to conclude agreements on employment conditions. The State favours conciliatory solutions for labour disputes, as well as labour consultation.

The Government mentioned that it has taken into account the comments made by the Committee of Experts with regard to the application of the provisions of this Convention to workers of public bodies. In effect, the drafting committee of the draft Labour Code relied on the relevant documents sent to this Organization, observing the prerequisites required of workers under section 353 in order to declare a strike, and concerning the services where strikes are prohibited under sections 353 and 284 of the Labour Code, and section 291 of the Code of Labour Procedures. With regard to the submission of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration, the new Constitution already provides under section 96 that arbitration is optional.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his Government undertook to communicate the reports due and, if it had not yet done so, this was due to the fact that since 3 February 1989, which marked the end of 30 years of dictatorship, a democratic reconstruction process had begun and eight national elections had been conducted and a national constitutional assembly (with the participation of trade union leaders and employer representatives) adopted a new Constitution on 20 June 1992. The articles of the new Constitution dealing with labour relations were the result of the consensus among the social partners. They recognized freedom of association of all workers of the public and private sectors, the right to collective bargaining, the right to strike and lockout. Moreover, the draft that revised the whole labour code was in its final stages of examination by the Chamber of Deputies which had done its best to include the comments made by the representative of the ILO. An agreement on strikes and lockouts existed between the representatives of workers and employers. He added that the Government intended to repeal Law No. 200 thus giving public servants a new legal status, probably within the next year. This situation had not, however, prevented the conclusion for the first time of collective agreements in the public sector. The Government also undertook to amend the Labour Procedural Code and had requested the technical assistance of the Office in this regard. Finally, he stated his Government's intention to apply the Convention and that it would do its best to this end.

The Workers' members noted with regard to the report of the Committee of Experts that the Government had not supplied a report. This failure was all the more regrettable as positive factors had been noted in 1992, a mission had been carried out during the same year by an ILO regional adviser, the situation was generally developing positively, and the Constitution was adopted in June 1992 which, in particular, recognized freedom of association. Subsequently the situation appeared to have markedly deteriorated. They noted with regret that the examination of the draft new Labour Code was suspended and that the Government seemed to wish to impose, without consulting the social partners, a Code that would not be in comformity with ILO standards. While taking note of certain partial revisions of the legislation, such as the new conditions for participation in the executive committees of trade unions, they regretted the lack of relevant information from the Government. They also noted the contradictions between the information presented to this Committee in 1992 and the written information given to this Committee this year. The Government still seemed to be referring to section 353 of the former Labour Code that it had declared to be repealed last year, and appeared not to be moving towards the legislative reform as required by the new Constitution.

The Employers' members generally shared the view of the Experts with regard to the six points of criticism in their report. However, they did not agree that strikes were an internal matter as, by definition, they were also directed against third parties, thus affecting their interests. As the Convention did not provide for the weighing of interests of third parties, the Government was responsible for establishing reasonable provisions if it was considered necessary to regulate strikes. They were unsure whether the correct percentage of members for calling a strike should be 75 per cent or some other figure, as this could not be ascertained from the terms of the Convention, and did not wish to take a stand with regard to compulsory arbitration in some circumstances as they were not in possession of all the facts. However, they emphasized that the other points listed by the Experts were clearly internal trade union matters in which the Government should not interfere. Although the new Constitution contained general principles concerning freedom of association and the right to strike, the essential issue was whether these principles had been implemented in specific legislation. A first draft of such a law had been mentioned, but they were unaware of its content. With regard to Convention No. 98, the Employers' members noted that there was a gap in the protection of civil servants and public enterprise employees, a lack of protection against trade union discrimination, and no free collective bargaining. Clarifications were requested with regard to the "Memoranda of Agreement on Labour Relations and Social Security in the Bi-national Hydro-electric Power Plant YACYRETA" which prevented the establishment of employers' associations. They asked the Government to provide a detailed report with the corresponding legal texts attached.

The Workers' member of Paraguay stated that it would have been necessary to have available a detailed report in response to the well-conceived indications of the Committee of Experts, which referred to points that, for the most part, had been raised the last year. In his opinion the indications of the Government representative conformed to reality, since he referred to the transitional situation which the country was going through. The new national Constitution proclaimed a Social State of Law which gave priority to development with social justice. The merit of this democratic development was due in part to the role of the working class and to the commitment which all this represented for workers. He hoped that the Inter-American Agreement on Human Rights would be genuinely applied in his country with the support of the social partners, and would bring with it true economic and social progress. He was concerned about the situation of the new Labour Code, fearing that the victories which had taken shape in the Code would not in the end be expressed in concrete terms since the discussion had been extended. The code should be promulgated before 1 July, when there would be a new change of the legislature. With regard to the application of Convention No. 87, he thought that freedom of association was for now being fully respected since there were major deficiencies in respect of the protection of this freedom. A very low percentage of workers was unionized and it was necessary to strengthen trade union rights in order to ensure the free organization of workers. With regard to Convention No. 98, it was necessary that the country have a new labour law containing the indispensable changes that would ensure that collective bargaining would be adequate, and would permit Paraguayan trade unions to perform the role they should have. He referred to the voting procedures in trade union elections provided for in the new Constitution, and hoped that this constitutional provision would be strictly applied to guarantee the return to democracy. Finally, he referred to the need to be able to rely upon a Ministry of Labour having the necessary means to ensure compliance with the labour laws.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that it was unacceptable that non-compliance with a Convention that was ratified 31 years ago would be due to planned steps for the strengthening of democracy. The points established by the Committee of Experts with regard to the restriction of the right to strike, the prohibition of strikes in essential public services and the prohibition on collective resolutions allowed one to see that the rights of workers were being trampled on and that an outrage was committed against the trade union movement, exactly like that which had occurred in the rest of Latin America. He rejected as too simple the proposition that the problems were the result of the present transition to democracy, since this would run the unacceptable risk of being invoked by the governments to justify non-compliance with the Conventions. He invited the workers of Paraguay not to act as sounding boards for orders which were inappropriate for workers.

The Workers' member of Uruguay stated that he had closely followed the democratic process in Paraguay since his own central trade union organization was part of the coordinating committee of central trade union organizations which joined together the central trade union organizations of Paraguay, Chile, Bolivia and Brazil. He considered that they were in the presence of a case not only of stagnation of freedom of association but of a clear movement backwards. Last April he had participated in a meeting in Paraguay in which the two main central trade union organizations of this country – the National Central Trade Union Organization of Workers (CNT) and the Unified Central Trade Union Organization of Workers (CUT) – demanded respect for freedom of association, non-interference by the Government in internal matters of trade unions and denounced the Government's violation of the Convention. A decision of the Court of Justice which should have suspended the decision to leave trade union leaders on the fringes of legality had not been respected by the Government. He requested that the conclusions which this Committee had adopted last year be maintained and strengthened.

The Government representative stated that the discussion of the draft Labour Code was not suspended but delayed due to the position taken by the employers. Trade union freedom was not restricted and the declarations of the Workers' members of Colombia and Uruguay were incorrect. Numerous trade union organizations had been created, including in the public sector, and the process was under way for the establishment of a trade union federation of the civil servants. The right to strike was not limited and an agreement existed between the workers and the employers concerning the procedures for the negotiation of strikes on a tripartite basis. In respect of collective agreements, he declared that there were five or six such agreements in different enterprises of the public sector, in particular in the national cement industry. He recognized that there had been a certain negligence in the supply of reports; it would be appropriate to insist that the Ministries of Justice and of Labour comply with their obligation in this respect. Considering that certain information shaded the truth for political reasons, he stressed that his country has made progress in the field of freedom of association and civil rights and that it would be unjust not to recognize this progress. He stated that the Government would invite an ILO mission to visit the country so as to obtain a better appreciation of the situation and to provide all the necessary assistance.

The Employers' members noted that the misunderstandings and the erroneous information mentioned by the Government representative would have been less numerous if the Government had communicated its report and if the representative had taken a position on the concrete points. The Government should send a complete report which would permit an assessment of eventual progress.

The Workers' members supported the proposals made by the Employers' members concerning the lack of relevant information. In 1992 this Committee had expressed strong hope that the Government would indicate in the near future that the necessary changes had been made. The Committee should express its disappointment now that the Government had not sent a report and should insist that the Government fulfil this obligation.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government and regretted that the report due had not been sent in time to be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted the attitude of the Government with regard to the questions under discussion. Nevertheless, in view of the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts and shared by this Committee on the questions raised for some years, the Committee expressed its firm hope that appropriate measures would be adopted as rapidly as possible. The Committee asked the Government to adopt all the necessary measures so as to bring all its legislation and practice into conformity with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, as well as to provide the pertinent texts and the agreement signed by the social partners on the right to strike. The Committee took due note of the desire of the Government to receive new technical assistance from the ILO which it hoped would be provided as soon as possible.

Yemen (ratification: 1969). A Government representative recalled that in replying to the comments of the Committee of Experts in 1992, the Government had stated that there had been various changes and amendments following unification of the two Yemens. The Constitution of the Republic of Yemen, which was adopted by referendum following the unification, guaranteed to all citizens, without any discrimination, the right to organize trade unions freely and without any constraint. Any infringement of the Constitution, which might be found in previous legislation, would be regarded as unconstitutional and would be repealed. A draft Labour Code had been elaborated in consultation with the Confederation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry and the trade unions which tried to avoid the various defects of the old Labour Code and would be in conformity with the international Conventions ratified by Yemen. However, it had not yet been promulgated for various reasons. The new Parliament which had been elected by free democratic elections on 27 April 1993 had before it a large number of bills intended to replace former labour laws. The Government would keep the ILO informed about new developments in this area. The Government had also requested, through the Regional Adviser on International Labour Standards, technical assistance from the Office in this matter.

The Workers' members recalled that this case had been discussed in this Committee in 1985 and 1991, while in 1986 the Government had failed to appear before the Committee. Stating that this case concerned fundamental Conventions on human rights, the Workers' members expressed great concern over this long-outstanding issue, as well as their disappointment at the reply given by the Government representative. They could not accept the idea that the Government would delay action on a substantial number of points in respect of these Conventions until reformulation of the whole of the Labour Code was achieved. These were not minor points, but serious contraventions concerning questions of guaranteeing the establishment of trade unions without prior authorization, introducing the facility of trade union pluralism, lifting the ban on political activities of trade unions, non-interference of the public authorities in their financial administration, and giving foreign workers the rights to hold trade union office. The existing laws and practices in the country were not in conformity with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Unless there was some distinct improvement in the very near future, the Workers would be calling upon this Committee on a subsequent occasion, possibly next year, to underline this case in a special way.

The Employers' members, while fully recognizing issues relating to legislative difficulties, concurred with the Workers' members that this was indeed a serious case with a long history. In 1992 the Government had referred to the draft legislation, but it was not known whether or not this legislation remedied the fundamental problems mentioned by the Workers' members. There had never been a collective bargaining agreement in the country, as envisaged under Convention No. 98. The Employers considered it necessary for the ILO to provide some technical assistance to the Government and to examine the legislative proposals, particularly in view of the fact that the enactment of this legislation was going to take some time.

The Government representative stated that his country was most scrupulous in its respect for human rights. He reiterated that those provisions of the old Labour Code which were not in conformity with the provisions of the new Constitution were de facto null and void. Article 39 of the Constitution guaranteed the right of trade union organization, freedom of association and political rights, which would be further amplified in the new Labour Code. Before the unification of the two Yemens, these provisions had already been in effect in the southern part of the country and the Labour Code had already guaranteed all the rights of organization and the rights of workers to engage in political activity. The Treaty of Unification provided that the most favourable provisions for workers would be implemented following unification and pending the adoption of the new Constitution and the new unified Labour Code. Yemen needed time to elaborate and to implement this unified Labour Code, as well as to repeal many old laws superseded by the new Code. Technical assistance from the ILO was required in all of these legislative activities.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Government representative concerning points under discussion for many years relating to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. It noted that a draft Labour Code had been elaborated which would resolve the problems raised, and that technical assistance of the Regional Adviser on Standards had been requested. The Committee expressed its deep concern over a series of existing divergences between the current national legislation and the obligations deriving from the Conventions concerning the denial of the right to establish and join trade unions for many categories of workers, the interference of the public authorities in trade union affairs, the possibility of dissolving trade unions by administrative authority, the lack of protection against anti-union discrimination, the lack of protection against undue interference, as well as the absence of adequate provisions to encourage and promote collective bargaining. The Committee urged the Government to proceed rapidly with legislative review taking into account all the points that had been drawn to its attention. Since these matters had been the subject of concern for many years, the Committee trusted that it would be able to note concrete progress of a decisive nature, both in legislation and in practice, in the very near future. The Committee expressed its desire to review this case next year.

Convention No. 98: Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining, 1949

Indonesia (ratification: 1957). The Government has communicated the following information:

1. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination

(a) Based on Presidential Decree No. 1 of 1980 on the Report of Obligations concerning Employment Opportunity, employers should report to the Government if they plan to hire workers. This report should include the number of workers requested, as well as their qualifications, age and education. There is no clause whereby the workers concerned should or should not be involved in membership of a trade union or any particular trade union. This regulation is consistent with section 2 of Act No. 14 of 1969 which states that "In the enforcement of this Act and the implementing regulations to carry out this Act, there shall be no discrimination". If a jobseeker is discriminated against on the ground of his membership of an organization, he can report to the Ministry of Manpower, and basing himself on Act No. 14 of 1969, the official of the Ministry of Manpower can compel the employer to accept this particular jobseeker.

(b) Act No. 14 of 1969 states that "Every worker has the right to establish and become a member of a trade union". To guarantee this principle, the Ministry of Manpower issued Circular Letter No. 113/M/BW/90 which states that termination of employment connected with the establishment of membership and management of a trade union will not be permitted.

(c) On the basis of Act No. 12 of 1961 on Termination of Employment in Private Undertakings, no worker shall be dismissed without the approval of the Ministry of Manpower. If an employer requests the dismissal of a worker or workers due to his or their membership or involvement in a trade union, the Ministry of Manpower will not approve the termination.

2. Protection of workers' organizations against interference from employers

(a) Ministerial Decision No. 1109/Men/1986 has been revised by Ministerial Decision No. 438/Men/1992 on Guidance for the Establishment and Development of Trade Unions in the enterprise. This revision has been discussed by the tripartite body so that the aspirations of all parties concerned could be articulated and accommodated.

(b) Based on this new regulation, it has been stipulated that when workers intend to establish a trade union in a company, they are under no obligation to request permission from the employer. They merely have to inform the employer of their intention. If an employer interferes with the plan to form a trade union, the workers or the executives of the union at branch level should report to the Ministry of Manpower. The Ministry of Manpower will then ensure that the respective employer does not interfere with the establishment of the proposed trade union.

3. Restrictions on collective bargaining

In line with the previous clarifications given by the Government, Ministerial Regulation No. 5 of 1987 has been reviewed and replaced by Ministerial Regulation No. 3 of 1993 on the Registration of Trade Unions. This Regulation is based on the consensus and decisions of the tripartite body. In the new Regulation, there is a very substantial reduction in the formalities required in order to qualify for registration. Requirements for registration are aimed at protecting the interests of the workers and at maintaining the quality of the collective labour agreement.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his Government had already given a thorough explanation in 1991 on the same subject that was the object of the Committee of Experts' questions at the moment. Although Indonesia had increased the quality of life of its workers through the development of better working conditions, the Committee should acknowledge that these conditions were still based mainly on old regulations inherited from Dutch colonialism. However, review of these regulations was taking place in order to serve the interest of the people. To this end, Ministerial Decision No. 1109 of 1986 and Ministerial Regulation No. 5 of 1987 had just been revised by Ministerial Decision No. 438 of 1992 and Regulation No. 3 of 1993 respectively, with the consensus of a tripartite body. He concluded by stating that the subject under discussion was very minor as compared with a number of cases which were very substantial but which were not even recorded in this Committee.

The Workers' members pointed to the series of comments made by the Committee of Experts at the outset of its observation according to which there had not been sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions to protect workers against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship. The observation similarly pointed to the absence of sufficiently detailed provisions to protect workers' organizations against acts of interference. They stressed that the oral and written information provided by the Government would have to be submitted to the Committee of Experts for evaluation, since this information purported to respond to the Experts' observation. Particular attention had to be directed to the two legislative texts referred to by the Government, especially the Ministerial Decision No. 1109 of 1986, as revised by Ministerial Decision No. 438 of 1992, which provided that an employer would not be allowed to take any action which would prove disadvantageous to the workers in relation to their activities, as well as to the membership and management of a trade union at the enterprise level.

The Employers' members, recalling that this case had been discussed in 1986 and 1991, stated that it appeared that some steps had been taken to meet the obligations under the Convention. However, they had some doubts about this. The first problem concerned the issue of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment. Although there was the Act No. 14 of 1969 which stated categorically that there would be no discrimination, there was no indication of any cases having been brought. If there was a right under the law not to be discriminated against, it was to be expected that some cases had been lodged in this respect. The Employers' members were thus interested in obtaining information from the Government as to whether there had been any such cases. The second problem concerned the protection of workers' organizations against interference, and it appeared that a revised Ministerial Decision No. 438 of 1992 prohibited such interference. However, since the Employers' members were concerned with actual practice, they once again wondered if there had been any cases brought concerning this regulation. Finally, with regard to the broad restrictions on collective bargaining, the Government vaguely stated that these had been substantially reduced. The Employers' members considered that some clarification was required, because in order for the right to collective bargaining to be meaningful, workers had to have access to the process and there was nothing before this Committee that indicated that this was even feasible. Therefore the Government still had to go much further in order to meet the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Japan noted first that, according to the information made available to him by several trade union organizations, including the ICFTU, the protection and guarantees provided for under the Convention were not applied in public services and state enterprises. Secondly, he wondered what the definition of a state enterprise was. According to the same information, if the Government owned more than 5 per cent of shares in an enterprise, this was then considered to be a state enterprise and its employees were not afforded the protection guaranteed by the Convention.

The Employers' member of Indonesia confirmed the statement made by the Government representative. He referred to the existence of regulations which protected workers against anti-union discrimination and guaranteed that every worker had the right to establish and become a member of a trade union. Moreover, these regulations guaranteed that the termination of employment based on the membership or mangement of a trade union would not be permitted by the Ministry of Manpower, thus ensuring job security. Finally, these regulations protected workers' organizations from interference by employers since the workers only had to inform the employer if they wished to establish a trade union at the company level, and did not need to obtain prior authorization from the employer.

The Workers' member of Indonesia described the history of the trade union movement in Indonesia, pointing out that by 1959 there were approximately 100 national trade unions, 150 local unions and seven federations. But he doubted that the system was of real benefit to the workers because, in the following decade, only a further 200 industrial unions were created at the plant level and only 17 collective labour agreements signed. In addition, the activities of the unions had been influenced by political interest rather than the principles of real trade union movement. On 20 February 1973, every prominent trade union leader in Indonesia finally agreed to sign a declaration of unity of Indonesian workers and merged their organizations into one single body, the All-Indonesia Labour Federation (FBSI). The new structure of the trade union movement in 1973 enabled the unions to become more effective but still in line with the democratic system. During the following 12-year period, approximately 6,500 industrial unions were created at the plant level from the previous number of only 200 and the number of collective agreements increased to approximately 4,000. At the second national congress of the FBSI in 1985, the participating delegates decided to change the structure of the organization from a federation into a unitary one, and to change the name from FBSI to SPSI. After an eight-year period of the SPSI the total number of industrial unions at the plant level could be expected to progress to 11,000 and the number of collective labour agreements increased to 7,000, some of which were signed in the plantations. However, although the SPSI had made progress, it still faced problems because 15 per cent of the population lived below the poverty line and some workers were not well organized in the small and medium-scale industries.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands reminded the Committee that this case had not only been considered by the Committee of Experts and this Committee for many years, but that there had also been a complaint presented some years ago to the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government, however, had taken very limited action with respect to the conclusions of all the three bodies. While it was true that Indonesia was a complex country with enormous economic and social problems, the Government had accomplished many things in the fields in which it wanted to. Apparently, this will was not so strong with regard to freedom to bargain collectively. In this respect, the Government felt entitled to flexible implementation of international labour standards and this was why it did not see the point of changing the system. Although the Workers were in favour of trade union unity which was the best way to represent and defend their interests, they did not accept that the decision to create and maintain trade union unity was a government affair, which was the case here. In practice, if organizations other than the "official" trade union centre were set up in Indonesia to defend workers' interests and to bargain collectively for them, then the Government refused to register them as trade unions, although they could be registered as mass organizations. However, registration as a trade union was necessary for collective bargaining purposes. It was clear that the Government wanted only the SPSI to be the organization representing Indonesian workers. Referring to interference in trade union activities, he stressed that such interference came not only from employers, but also from the army in Indonesia. Army officers were active in all mass organizations including unions. They did so on the basis of an official state ideology of "dual functioning" of the army in society. A significant number of retired army officers held leading positions in the trade union movement at the local and regional level, with the aim of exercising control over the movement. In his opinion, military involvement in trade unions was not conducive to their free and democratic functioning. Finally, on the question of trade union monopoly he first wished to know if the Government was prepared to register as a trade union an organization called the SBSI, which had organized many workers in the past year and which wanted to be recognised as a trade union. He could provide documents proving that employers threatened their workers that they should not have dealings with the SBSI. Secondly, he pointed out that under the new Law on registration of unions reviewing the old one of 1987, if a trade union centre wanted to be registered with the Ministry of Labour, it had to organise at least 100 unions at enterprise level and to total at least 10,000 members. Moreover it should count at least 25 branch level managers (by which it appeared that full time officers were meant) in 25 districts, and 5 regional level managers in 5 of the 27 provinces. If a trade union wanted to be registered under the new law it had to count at least 10 registered industrial unions. In other words, a national centre that wants to be registered has to be able to prove 100,000 members, 250 "managers" at the industrial level in 25 districts and 50 regional "managers" in 5 provinces.

The Government representative, in response to the comments made by the Workers' and Employers' members, stated that his Government would, as in the past, try its best to comply with the implementation of this Convention. However, there had never been any cases pertaining to issues of anti-union discrimination. He maintained that the Indonesian case was very minor as compared with a number of other cases which were much more substantive but which were not even recorded in the report of the Committee of Experts. Referring to the points made by the Workers' member of the Netherlands he pointed out first that with respect to the workers outside the SPSI there were close to 100 non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in Indonesia. Although the number of persons involved were less than 50, they had been invited to give their views in relation to the new Ministerial Decision and Regulation. Some of their ideas had been included in the new regulations. Regarding the dismissal of workers for their trade union activities, he reiterated that nobody could be dismissed in Indonesia without the approval of the Government. He concluded by stating that there was no intention on the Government's part of limiting the right of the workers to organize and to bargain collectively.

The Workers' member of Japan intervened again to request clarification from the Government. The Workers' member of the Netherlands intervened once more to reiterate his previous stance on the case and requested clarification once again from the Government. With a view to the request for concrete cases made by the Employers and the reply of the Government that there were no such cases, the Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that he could indeed document a number of relevant cases and offered to send them to the Office.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government representative in relation to issues that have been discussed over a number of years. It regretted to note that the Government considered that the national legislation was not contrary to the Convention as regards protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers. It took due note of the information provided by the Government according to which the 1993 Ministerial Regulation of on the registration of trade unions had reduced the conditions required for registration, and thus, participation in collective bargaining. The Committee urged the Government to take appropriate measures to ensure that workers and workers' organizations could exercise trade union rights without fear of anti-union reprisals and without any risk of interference on the part of employers. The Committee invited the Government to provide the ILO with a copy of the Ministerial Regulation of 1993 so that the Committee of Experts could make a full assessment of the progress reached in bringing this part of the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expressed the firm hope that progress would be reached in the very near future.

Paraguay (ratification: 1966). See under Convention No. 87.

Sweden (ratification: 1950). A Government representative of Sweden stated that due to a dramatic increase in social insurance expenditure effective on 1 March 1991, the Government had reduced the compensation rate from 90 per cent to 65 per cent for the first three days of a period of illness, and to 80 per cent for following days, while providing the former compensation rate of 90 per cent after 90 days. Sickness allowance was also reduced by any amount in excess of 10 per cent that was received from the employer during the first 90 days of a period of illness, and after that date by the whole amount received from the employer. Collective agreement provisions regarding sick pay remained valid, but the Government assumed that parties to such agreements would adapt their provisions to the legislative amendments. However, if collective agreements on full compensation were concluded, there was a corresponding reduction in payments from the national sickness allowance scheme. He stated that further changes were made upon the entry into force of the Sick Pay Act in January 1992, so that employers were required to furnish sick pay during the first 14 days of an employee's illness, and employees were entitled to 75 per cent of their income during the first three days and 90 per cent during the remaining days. It was intended that, to avoid inequalities of sickness compensation among different groups, there would be no basic deviation from statutory sick pay levels. However, the Government did not intend to achieve this through statutory interference with the content of collective agreements or with freedom of collective bargaining. If new agreements were concluded providing a level of compensation above that provided under the Sick Pay Act, it was possible for legislation to be passed making this level the norm for all the labour market. The guaranteed level would then rise but not form a ceiling for levels of compensation. The final change made effective on 1 April 1993 consisted of a reduction in the compensation rate as of the 90th day of illness. He agreed with the Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO) that trade unions should have the right to seek to improve the living and working conditions of those they represented through collective bargaining and other legal means; that public authorities should refrain from any intervention that would limit or hinder this right; and that every such intervention violated the principle that employee and employer organizations should have the right to organize their activities and formulate their programmes freely. However, he did not agree that the measures which the Government had taken limited the right to conclude agreements freely on sick pay and were therefore in conflict with the basic principles of the Convention. All that the Government had done was to reduce a benefit under the health insurance system, while further reducing such benefits in cases where employers topped up wages over a certain level. He emphasized that there was no statutory ceiling placed on levels of sick pay. The parties remained free to negotiate and conclude agreements on full compensation. As insurer, the Government had to be free to guarantee the compensation which it found appropriate. Although such past guarantees had become a foundation for collective agreements, the guarantee of the right to collective bargaining provided under the Convention could not imply that levels of compensation under the social insurance system could never be changed. He emphasized that alleged contraventions of the Conventions which his country had ratified were considered very seriously because the Government wished to fulfil its obligations. In conclusion, he informed the Committee that parties to collective bargaining in his country had voluntarily reached agreements that did not exceed the total compensation level desired by the Government.

The Employers' members stated that, in strictly formal terms, it might be that the legislative measures taken by the Government, inter alia, to reduce the state contribution to sick pay, were not in full conformity with the Convention. However, while promoting free collective bargaining, the Convention did not exclude legislative measures in an area where there was also contractual regulation. Compulsory regulation under the legislation could be established where there were important considerations of common interest justifying such regulation, as in this case. The Convention did not guarantee any absolute freedom of collective bargaining and the Employers' members could only agree with the Committee of Experts that there was in fact no infringement of the Convention. The Employers considered that the Committee of Experts could look at this case again, if necessary.

The Workers' members stressed that the question was of a fundamental character and went far beyond technical considerations. Referring to the paragraphs 311, 312, 313, 316, 318 and 319 of the 1983 General Survey of the Committee of Experts on freedom of association and collective bargaining, they stated that the principle of autonomy of the parties and of non-interference by the authorities in collective bargaining should be strictly respected. The Workers considered that if a government wanted to take budgetary or economic decisions with implications on the revenue of workers or insured persons, it should choose mechanisms that did not affect free collective bargaining and the results of this process. The implementation of this principle required extensive tripartite consultations, mutual confidence and respect of the independence of the parties involved. The Workers regretted that lately certain governments exercised direct or indirect intervention in the collective bargaining process instead of developing social dialogue. This approach did not contribute to the solution of the economic and budgetary problems. They insisted that the Swedish Government review its policy and practice in the light of the Convention and keep the Committee of Experts informed of any new collective agreement or state measures dealing with this matter.

A Workers' member of Sweden explained that the Swedish insurance systems comprised a number of benefits, including health insurance, basic pension, occupational pension and partial pension schemes, as well as complementary payments which were governed by collective agreements on sick pay and supplementary pensions. The unions had long had the right to make agreements providing for sick pay coverage up to 100 per cent. The present legislation, however, limited such agreements; sick pay benefits ranged now from 75 to 90 per cent of the insured person's qualifying income and concerned even those with higher incomes. In order to make sure that these measures affected everyone, the Government had chosen a system which restricted the rights of certain classes of workers which benefited through agreements from a higher level of compensation in case of illness than other groups in society. In addition to this, as from 1 April 1993, the Government introduced one qualifying day and a level of compensation of 65 per cent for the second and third day of illness. These changes represented an encroachment on the right to negotiate freely and were in conflict with the principles of the Convention. There was a tangible long-term risk that these changes would be pushed further towards similar encroachments on other supplementary benefits, such as pensions covered by collective agreements. It was a very important matter of principle. The cost of the various social security schemes had been deducted from the funds generally available for pay rises, and the workers had always before chosen to use the money available for social security instead of for higher wages. The right to negotiate freely was also to comprise the right for employees' and employers' organizations to choose for themselves how they wished to structure and formulate the conditions of employment without restrictions being set by the legislator, particularly in the case of areas which had been governed by collective agreements for almost 50 years. Collective agreements guaranteeing 100 per cent sick pay would be made invalid and, consequently, there would be an encroachment on the right to negotiate freely. The Swedish trade unions wanted this Committee to pay special attention to the threats, qualified by the Committee of Experts as "something more than mere persuasion", from the side of the Swedish Government to establish a new sick pay ceiling. The Committee should adopt firm conclusions requiring the Government to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention, especially by amending the legislation, and to report next year on the implementation of its provisions.

A Workers' member of Germany stressed the necessity of preserving the principle of having more favourable regulations through collective agreements than those provided for by legislation. He stated that persuasive attempts by the Government in connection with collective bargaining were seen as a concrete threat to the trade unions and the employers, constituting an infringement of Article 4 of the Convention. This was all the more regrettable as Sweden had always been exemplary and supported the principles of freedom of association. He associated himself with the conclusions proposed by the Workers' member of Sweden.

A Workers' member of New Zealand supported the statement made by the Workers' members and the Workers' member of Sweden. He stated that a lot had been said in recent years about sanctity of agreements by employers and governments. The principle was that, a bargain having been agreed upon between employer and union parties, the terms of that bargain should be observed and there should not be any interference by governments in collective bargaining. He pointed out that under the National Insurance Act the Swedish Government had exercised state powers unfairly in a way which specifically diminished the value of the bargain negotiated on behalf of the workers. He suggested that this constituted an act of interference by the Government as agent for the employer in breach of Article 2 of the Convention. With reference to the proposed amendments to the Sick Pay Act, he stated that to threaten might not be a violation of the Convention, but it was nevertheless undesirable as having the potential to undermine the integrity of, and respect for, the terms of the Convention.

A Workers' member of Norway stated that this case touched the crucial legal question of the extent and limits of the autonomy of the social partners involved. Referring to paragraph 318 of the Committee of Experts' 1983 General Survey, he noted that the Government had, in fact, forbidden sickness allowances provided for under the voluntarily concluded collective agreements. If the social partners did not accede to the instructions given by the Government, they were threatened by legislation on this matter. This was contrary to the obligations under Article 4 of Convention No. 98 and Article 8 of Convention No. 154.

A Government member of the United Kingdom stated that cases such as this one, where the Committee of Experts had noted no violation of the Convention, should not be brought before this Committee.

The Government representative, referring to the conclusions made by the Committee of Experts, stated that his Government did not consider the measures taken to be in violation of the Convention. His Government would, of course, keep the Committee of Experts informed of any future development in this matter. The Government had only reduced a benefit in the health insurance system in cases where a worker, by obtaining sick pay from his employer, did not sustain a heavy loss. The social partners were still free to conclude agreements on higher compensation, including agreements on full sick pay. The measures taken by the Government had led to a reduction not only of expenditure from the social insurance system but also, to a great extent, had reduced sick leave and increased productivity in Swedish industry. The Government was of the opinion that Sweden had not violated any ILO Convention in this matter.

The Committee took note of the oral information submitted by the Government representative and of the discussion which had taken place in this Committee. The Committee recalled the importance of the principle of autonomy of the parties involved in collective bargaining, and that the public authorities in general should respect this autonomy and abstain from any intervention. The Committee considered that the Government should try to persuade the social partners to have regard voluntarily to major economic and social policy considerations and the general interest invoked by the Government, since persuasion was always preferable to any imposition. The Committee requested the Government to provide, in its next report, detailed information concerning any measure taken to encourage voluntary negotiations, including information on any new collective bargaining agreements, legislation and court decisions having a bearing on this matter.

Turkey (ratification: 1952). A Government representative, referring to compulsory arbitration in cases of collective disputes other than those relating to essential services, pointed out that this was only an issue in the framework of the suspension of strikes. The application of this compulsory arbitration procedure was in fact limited to cases where work stoppages due to a strike would endanger public security or health of the whole or part of the population as stated in section 33 of Act No. 2822. As this Committee was well aware, it had been concluded in paragraph 214 of the 1983 General Survey of the Committee of Experts that "if strikes are restricted or prohibited in the public service or in essential services, appropriate guarantees must be afforded to protect workers who are thus denied one of the essential means of defending their occupational interests. Restrictions should be offset by adequate impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures, in which the parties concerned can take part at every stage and in which the awards should in all cases be binding on both parties". When exercising the power of compulsory arbitration, the Government and the judiciary were extremely careful not to exceed the limits set by the legislator. It had to be stressed that this procedure was governed by constitutional rules strictly limiting its exercise to exceptional situations. Moreover, the mediation of the Minister of Labour continued throughout the period of suspension, with all sides having the right to resort to voluntary arbitration at any stage. In addition, the Government could revoke its decision if the reasons which had necessitated the suspension no longer existed. It was also possible for the parties to reach an agreement during this period. However, if the dispute had still not been resolved, it was then brought for compulsory arbitration before the Supreme Arbitration Board. Thus, resorting to compulsory arbitration in cases where a strike was postponed was not an interference in the collective bargaining process. On the contrary, this procedure was applied in order to find a settlement to disputes where the collective bargaining process had reached an impasse. It was a mechanism which was resorted to exceptionally as demonstrated by the fact that, since January 1991, compulsory arbitration had been used at only four worksites in Turkey. This was by no means an automatic procedure but it was a mechanism which was resorted to exceptionally with the unique objective of making sure that workers were not deprived of collective agreements under certain circumstances. The second issue concerned the numerical requirements in section 12 of Act No. 2822. The Goverment had indeed been seeking "measures appropriate to national conditions to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of voluntary negotiation by means of collective bargaining". The reason why the relevant provisions in the law had been preserved was simply because there was consensus amongst the most representative social parties to maintain the existing system. Although a draft Bill had been prepared by the Government in 1991, it could not be processed further for this very reason. The Government would, however, continue to take into consideration the observations of the Committee of Experts. With regard to the collective bargaining rights of public servants, this issue did not seem to be directly linked to the No. 87 Convention. However, since the Government had ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) at the end of 1992, new legislative measures would be expected to follow with regard to public servants. More generally, it was significant to note that besides Convention No. 87, the Government had also ratified five other Conventions in 1992: the Minimum Age (Industry) (Revised) Convention, 1937 (No. 59); the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135); the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142); the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144); and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). The Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) had also been submitted to the Parliament for ratification. This should be considered a very constructive move by the Government. The Government had actively embarked upon revision of all existing labour legislation, in particular Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lock-outs. To this end, the social partners had been asked twice during the last 10 months to convey their views and propose amendments to the Government. Some responses had just been received, and the Government was in the process of assessing them and would continue this dialogue with the social partners. Some social partners, however, had not responded at all.

The Workers' members, while welcoming the ratification by Turkey of many important Conventions which reflected the good intentions of the Government, expressed their concern at the persistent violation of this Convention. The case was not a new one; it had been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts for several years and of discussions in this Committee. The formal promises made by the Government to the Conference Committee in 1991, and to the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1992, to take the necessary measures to comply with the obligations of the Convention did not appear to be honoured. These measures concerned the repeal of the provision which allowed trade unions to bargain collectively only if they had a 10 per cent minimum branch membership, and the guarantee of trade union rights to employees in the public service. They expected the Government to take the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention and to provide any useful information in this respect in a report.

The Employers' members stated that, according to the Government representative, compulsory arbitration in practice had almost no significance. It had been applied when strikes had arisen but only led to a temporary suspension of strikes. With regard to the numerical requirements for collective bargaining, both social partners were against any amendment to the legislation regulating this point. Moreover, there were some kind of qualitative or quantitative restrictions in nearly all countries. Although these numerical requirements did not have to be retained, they did have a certain advantage vis-à-vis other restrictions on collective bargaining in practice, in that they were clear-cut and less vague. The Committee of Experts had itself previously accepted limitations regarding representativity in collective bargaining. With regard to the right to bargain collectively of public servants, the Government representative had stated that in recent years the Government had ratified a number of important Conventions, in particular Convention No. 87. This question could thus be examined in another connection at a later stage. In any case the Government should continue to provide information.

The Workers' member of Norway stated that it was a shame that Turkey continued to apply legislation concerning compulsory arbitration and concerning the prohibition of the right to bargain collectively of public servants. It was equally serious that Turkey maintained the requirements of 10 per cent minimum branch membership and more than 50 per cent membership of the employees in a workplace for collective bargaining purposes. In practice, this legislation which was contrary to the Convention, prohibited many national trade unions from concluding collective agreements in a great number of enterprises in the country. This was, for instance, the case of the trade union DISK. The Government should be urged to change the said legislation as quickly as possible.

The Workers' member of Turkey regretted that the Government and the employers in his country continued to violate the Convention. Although the labour legislation in force provided for the legal protection of workers against anti-union discrimination, tens of thousands of workers affiliated to unions were being dismissed without any valid reason. Trade union rights and freedoms were violated by the 1982 Constitution, Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lock-outs, which had been promulgated by five Generals following the military coup of 12 September 1980. Although Article 6 of the Convention only excluded public servants engaged in the administration of the State, the Government also excluded other public servants not covered by this definition including clerks and janitors, by administrative measures. Contract personnel employed in public economic enterprises were prohibited from establishing and joining trade unions of their own choosing. Strikes were strictly banned for these categories of workers. In fact, in general, strike bans applied to a majority of workers employed under a labour contract, for example, those in banking, energy, coal mines, all kinds of urban transport, petroleum and petrochemicals, health and education. Many trade union officers and workers had been convicted on grounds of the violation of these bans. The Government was empowered to suspend strikes and thus to solve the dispute by compulsory arbitration. Draft Bills for the democratization of political and social life and of labour legislation had been submitted by his union to the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. However, no tripartite activity had been undertaken on the subject. Although this was a problem, it would be a mistake to give top priority to the repeal of the numerical preconditions required for collective bargaining, since the main problem was the democratization as a whole of working life and of the social and political structures. In order to guarantee the application of the Convention, existing labour laws which were the remnants of the military regime had to be amended. The Government should take into consideration the recommendations formulated by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its reports submitted to the Governing Body concerning Cases Nos. 1521, 1577, 1582 and 1583.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands emphasized that the Committee of Experts had stated that the Turkish legislation on the three points mentioned in its report was in violation of the Convention. The encouragement and promotion of collective bargaining, recognized by Article 4 of the Convention, was completely absent from existing legislation. Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective bargaining, strikes and lock-outs were also in contradiction with the Convention. They were based on the Constitution whose articles went into some detail as far as trade unions were concerned. For example, article 51 (7) required a person to be employed for ten years in order to establish a trade union. Thus, it would not be sufficient to amend Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822, but the Constitution itself on the points dealing directly with trade unions. Furthermore, he found the Government representative's statement to be negative with respect to the three points raised by the Committee of Experts. In particular, the argument that the Government could not change the law on collective bargaining because the social partners opposed it was not a good one. When legislation was in contradiction with the Convention, the Government had to amend it even if social partners did not agree with this.

The Workers' member of Italy stated that the obstacles to free collective bargaining noted by the Committee of Experts were all the more serious because the State played an important role in the national economy. As to the determination of the most representative trade unions, this right should first of all belong to the workers even if, as was the case in Italy, legislation could override their choice.

The Workers' member of Greece asked three questions of the Government representative concerning the Convention. With regard to the question of representatives, what did he think of the hypothesis in which a trade union represented more than 50 per cent of the employees in an enterprise but had less than 10 per cent of the workers in a branch? Moreover, was it correct that a worker who wished to change over from one sector to another and who wished to change trade unions needed to sign an expensive authenticated document? With regard to arbitration, what were the conditions for determination by the parties of the members of the arbitration body? Another question related more to Convention No. 87 which had been ratified recently. It would be useful if the Committee were to be informed of the reasons why the other Turkish trade union confederation (DISK), which was a member of the European Confederation of Trade Unions was not part of the workers' delegation to the Conference.

The Workers' member of Germany associated himself with the statements made by the other Worker members and particularly with the statement of the representative of the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions. It was regrettable that with regard to the definition of public servants contained in Article 6 of the Convention, the Government still maintained its previous stance. While quoting the 1983 General Survey, the Government representative should have specified that the Survey gave a very narrow definition of the concept of public servants. The conclusions adopted by the present Committee in 1991 had requested the Government to change its attitude on this point and the absence of progress in this respect should also be deplored.

The Government member of Germany welcomed the presence of the Chairman of the largest Turkish Confederation and stated that it would have been useful if the latter had indicated if what had been said by the Government representative on the opposition of the social partners to an amendment to the conditions of representativity for collective bargaining purposes was correct, and in this case, the reasons for the opposition.

The Workers' member of Spain recalled that freedom of association was based on the right to bargain collectively and the right to strike. Even in the event of Turkish trade unions allowing restrictions on the right to bargain collectively, the supervisory bodies of the ILO should consider the situation as being contrary to the proper application of the Convention.

The Government member of the Netherlands stated that he was very pleased to hear that Turkey had ratified a number of very fundamental human rights Conventions, including Conventions Nos. 87 and 151. However, ratifying Conventions was not only a question of a declaratory effect but should also be put into practice by way of legislation.

The Government representative stated that, in the case of the numerical requirements, he had only made a factual statement about the positions of the two most representative social partners. There was a very clear agreement amongst the parties to retain the existing legislation. He was not in a position to commit his Government as to what action could be taken in the future but he thought that the positions of the social partners on this issue should be considered as indicative of the Government's future attitude. It would nevertheless take the Committee of Experts' comments into account in its continuing dialogue with the social partners. The cases of compulsory arbitration and public servants represented important issues, but his Government had recently ratified very relevant international Conventions and was trying not to go beyond the limits set out in the legislation, nationally and internationally. The fact that compulsory arbitration had been exercised in a very limited manner was sufficient evidence of this. He reiterated that sincere dialogue would be continued with the social partners and that the ILO would be informed of any developments that took place.

The Committee took note of the comments of the Committee of Experts and the statement by the Government representative. The Committee considered three questions relating to the Convention. It took note of the Government representative's statement that compulsory arbitration was only resorted to in very precise circumstances, and was only possible within the framework of a set of proceedings in which both social partners were involved and was only used in very exceptional circumstances. The Committee took note of the statement by the Government representative to the effect that the numerical limitations mentioned by the Committee of Experts were based on a consensus between the main social partners but that the Government would make an attempt at bringing about a change in line with the position of the Committee of Experts. As for the question of collective bargaining for public service employees, the Government representative had referred to Conventions which had recently been ratified by Turkey, in particular Convention No. 87, within the context of which this matter would be examined in the future. Following a discussion of the three issues raised, the Committee recalled that it had already dealt with the same matters previously and it also recalled the wishes and demands voiced at the time, namely for a change in the relevant Turkish regulations and practice. The Committee therefore requested the Government to ensure that any remaining discrepancies between the law and practice in Turkey and the requirements under the terms of the Convention be removed and that it keep the Office and the Committee of Experts informed of all developments in every detail.

Convention No. 100: Equal Remuneration, 1951

Japan (ratification: 1967). A Government representative stated that the requirements of this Convention were met by section 4 of the Labour Standards Law which stipulated that discrimination based on gender was prohibited and provided sanctions for noncompliance. The Government had implemented these provisions through inspections and guidance. The wage differential between the sexes was a result of men and women working in different sectors as well as differences in the number of years of service under a seniority-based wage system, rather than the insufficient application of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value. In order to solve the problem of the segregation of men and women into different areas of work, the Government was making efforts to promote the enforcement of the Equal Employment Opportunity Law. As the difference in number of years of service of men and women was partly caused by the difficulty in balancing professional lives and family responsibilities, the Child Care Leave Law had been enacted in April 1992. Other measures were also being sought to assist women to balance these dual responsibilities.

The Employers' members noted that the key provision under this Convention was Article 1 providing for equal remuneration based on work of equal value. One means of accomplishing this was given in Article 3 of the Convention: the requirement that "measures be taken to promote objective appraisal of jobs on the basis of the work to be performed" to assist in the elimination of wage differentials between men and women. They acknowledged that although under this Convention it was not contemplated that measures to ensure equal treatment would be a means of equalizing pay between men and women, such an approach appeared to be part of the solution to the problem. In view of the fact that wide-scale participation of women in the labour market was a recent phenomenon, it was not surprising that pay between men and women was different when seniority was taken into account. To the extent that seniority-based wage systems were not instituted to discriminate against women, in their view such systems were not incompatible with the terms of the Convention. In this vein, they agreed with the Committee of Experts that the Government should examine whether women were discriminatorily assigned to low-paying jobs. However, they also considered that the Government should determine whether or not women preferred such jobs rather than attempting to obtain non-traditional higher-paying jobs, and suggested that the Government explore programmes that might encourage women to seek the latter.

The Workers' members noted with regard to the application of this Convention by Japan that there were, in addition to the 1988 survey referred to by the Committee of Experts, other studies (the 1993 ILO study and studies published in 1992 in the International Labour Review) demonstrating that the difference between the monthly average earnings of men and women was much more significant in Japan than in other industrialized countries, and that the practices and customs of large firms in this country were not in compliance with the Convention. In this regard, they stated that classification of posts and job descriptions were generally very vague. In such circumstances, comparisons between the average monthly earnings of men and women workers were difficult to carry out. They were concerned by the fact that, according to point 7 of the Experts' report, the Government considered that as there was no general consensus in favour of a different approach to the respective values attributed to work done mainly by women, there was no reason to consider revising the current practices and approaches. The Workers' members noted that the Convention required a courageous attitude on the part of the public authorities, and that it was paradoxical that a country as productive as Japan did not provide statistics on the application of the Convention. The Workers' members also had the impression that the laws of 1947 and 1985 were less productive than comparable legislation in other industrialized countries.

The Workers' member of Japan stated that his Government should quickly supply the relevant information requested by the Committee of Experts. He considered that in his country, despite having adopted laws on equality of opportunities and on childcare leave, as well as others which prohibited discrimination in wages between men and women, these were not sufficiently applied and there remained many matters which needed improvement and which had been dealt with by the Experts in their Report. He was of the opinion that, in order to improve the situation and to apply the principles of the Convention, it was necessary to apply global measures in the areas of equal employment opportunities and of workers with family responsibilities. He emphasized that his Government should ratify Conventions Nos. 111 and 156.

The Government representative stated that she had taken note of the comments made by the Workers' member of Japan.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative, in particular on the seniority-based wage system that was in force in her country. The Committee noted with interest that the Government intended to introduce the necessary amendments so as to apply the Convention fully in legislation and in practice. The Committee confirmed, however, that there were certain discrepancies between the remuneration for men and for women, as had been indicated by the Committee of Experts. These differences in wages between men and women were greater than in other highly industrialized countries. The Committee considered that a general policy was necessary, and not only prompt measures, in order to overcome this situation which kept a significant number of women in lower paid economic sectors. The Committee trusted that the Government would duly take into account the comments of the Committee of Experts and would supply detailed information, including statistics, which would show concrete and decisive progress in the application of this fundamentally important Convention in order to promote and guarantee equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women.

Convention No. 105: Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957

Brazil (ratification: 1965). See under Convention No. 29.

Ecuador (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

Convention No. 107: Indigenous and Tribal Populations, 1957

Brazil (ratification: 1965). A Government representative indicated that his Government would submit detailed information in writing about the implementation of the Convention within the appropriate time period. Having indicated that the Brazilian indigenous population was in a phase of growth, he referred to the work involving the revision of legislation on indigenous populations and stated that one year ago a draft law had been submitted to the National Congress which modified the Indigenous Population Act containing some provisions and fundamental principles from the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169). He emphasized that the purpose of this revision was to adapt the above-mentioned Act to the Brazilian Constitution that contained a specific chapter on indigenous populations, in conformity with the most recent developments in international law concerning human rights. He stated that most of the efforts of the Government were focused on the demarcation of the indigenous lands, which was the primary condition for the survival of these peoples. He cited figures that showed the extent of this task, which was the responsibility of the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI), and clarified that the lack of resources which were a result of the economic situation in Brazil prevented the Government from doing more in this area, but this was not because of a lack of political will. He indicated that the integrated project for the protection of indigenous territories and populations in the Amazon region, which was part of the pilot programme for the protection of Brazilian tropical forests, was intended to identify, demarcate and monitor the Amazon indigenous lands, but regrettably this project had not yet been approved by the World Bank and there were still no resources available. With reference to the activities of FUNAI, he indicated that in the area of health there were 32 health posts, 290 nursing posts and a hospital specifically for the treatment of indigenous persons. With regard to the particular situation of the Yanomamis and the reference in the Committee of Experts' observation to the effect that garimpeiros had required Indians in these regions to engage in forced labour, he emphasized that any contravention of the rights of not only the Yanomamis but also of the other indigenous populations were the subject of appropriate and thorough official investigation, but that the Brazilian authorities had received no reports of any incidents involving forced labour. He indicated that in June 1992 a presidential decree was promulgated that enforced the demarcation of Yanomami territory, which amounted to 9,664,975 hectares containing abundant mineral wealth. The territorial extension and existence of such riches were the cause of the problem of the invasion of these lands by garimpeiros and the difficulty of control and monitoring of this territory. During the months of February and March of 1993, a significant operation for the expulsion of the invaders had been completed by the indigenous authorities in cooperation with the Federal Police, which reduced the presence of garimpeiros from 5,000 or 6,000 to about 300. The Government would continue the efforts that it had undertaken to free the land of the Yanomamis from the illegal presence of the garimpeiros. He also stated that the Yanomami Health Programme, intended to provide emergency health care to this population, continued to be carried out.

The Workers' members emphasized the urgent and serious nature of this case which was evident from the report of the Committee of Experts. They noted the persistent lack of successive Governments to protect the fundamental rights of the indigenous people, noting that these Governments had never stopped the penetration of these territories for the pursuit of private and national interests, international economic development projects and military matters, nor, as a result, the massacres, beatings, threats and harassment of the indigenous people. They stated that although the new Constitution provided that the demarcation of indigenous territories had to be attained by October 1993, the Minister of Justice had shown little inclination to take the necessary coercive measures for the exclusion of non-indigenous peoples from the protected areas, on the basis of the financial cost that would be involved for the State in compensating the expelled settlers. This argument seemed all the less acceptable to the Workers' members in that the successive Governments had unfortunately always found sufficient financial resources when it was a matter of favouring the placement of non-indigenous peoples in these territories. They deplored the fact that the Government remained silent with regard to the suspension of the Yanomami Health Programme and that it did not follow up on the 1991 proposal by the United Nations to provide funding and technical assistance so as to deal with these matters. They asked the Government to inform them of any action that might have been taken against those responsible for the massacres and urged it to ensure that the legislation be strictly applied.

The Employers' members noted that the information supplied by the Government with regard to the application of the Convention was clearly not as positive as it had been with regard to its application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). Unfortunately, the brevity of the Experts' observations did not convey the full seriousness of the problem and, therefore, they appreciated the information provided by the Workers' members which indicated that the problem was very extensive, and stated that it would be helpful if the Government would provide information in its forthcoming report on the decrees concerning the delimitation of indigenous territory, environmental protection issues, self-sufficiency of indigenous communities and related health issues. They noted that in 1991 it had appeared that the Government was beginning to correct the worrying situation concerning indigenous populations, in particular the Yanomami tribes. However, although gold miners were expelled, this programme was suspended and they returned in large numbers. Only in March 1993 did the Government take action again by expelling thousands of miners. They emphasized the importance of implementing laws on a continuous basis. They called on the Government to spare no efforts in restoring the suspended Health Programme that had been directed towards solving the health care problems of the indigenous population, and to take advantage of all available external resources for this purpose.

The Government member of Germany stated that he, unlike the Employers' members, had understood the Government to say that the health care programme was being continued. However, he suggested that the Government should provide in its forthcoming report statistics indicating what measures had been taken in the past and what measures were being taken now so as to show whether and to what extent the programme was being continued. While recalling that the Government had had some success in past years in expelling the garimpeiros from the Yanomami tribal areas, he deplored the fact that some of these expelled persons had succeeded in returning. However, he did not have the impression that this had occurred because the Government, for financial reasons, had given up demarcation attempts. He invited the Committee to take account of the practical difficulties of action in the field when it noted the development of the situation.

The Government representative, referring to the four points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts, recalled the problems arising from the extensive area of these territories and confirmed that the health programmes continued with the assistance of universities and non-governmental organizations. He emphasized the action taken to expel the invaders and the extensive demarcation of indigenous lands which was a cause of satisfaction for the Government.

Another Government representative, in referring to the measures taken against the invaders of indigenous lands, indicated that these persons lived in conditions that were as difficult as those of the indigenous peoples, and tried to survive illegally on these lands. So as to expel them the Government had offered them transport to their places of origin. He emphasized the difficulty involved in monitoring such large territories and the impossibility of doing so during the rainy season. In response to the concern expressed by the Workers' members, he indicated that the Government had followed up on the offer of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to supplement government efforts to provide assistance to the Yanomamis, and that the Panamerican Health Organization was collaborating with the Yanomami Health Programme. The International Fund for Agricultural Development (FIDA) and the ILO had offered to cooperate with subsistence programmes for indigenous peoples of the Amazon region.

The Committee took note of the information as supplied by the Government representatives. In particular, it took note with interest that a draft law had been submitted to Parliament which established regulations for the chapter in the Constitution on indigenous persons and which took up some provisions of Convention No. 169. With regard to the gold prospectors, the Government had stated that it had no knowledge of any situation involving slavery or forced labour of the Yanomami Indians; moreover, there remained at present no more than 300 gold prospectors in the Yanomami territories. Nevertheless, the Committee noted that successive Governments had failed to duly protect the indigenous populations from massacres and abuses. The Committee urged the Government to adopt all appropriate measures to expel the gold prospectors who still were to be found in the Yanomami territories, and to provide medical assistance urgently to the indigenous persons who had contracted sicknesses as a result of the invasion of the gold miners. The Committee trusted that the Government would send a detailed report so that the Committee of Experts and this Committee could note decisive progress in the application of the Convention at their next meetings.

The Government representative indicated his disagreement with the reference in the conclusions to "failure of successive Governments to duly protect the indigenous populations from massacres and abuses", since this reference had been made only by the Workers' members.

India (ratification: 1958). A Government representative indicated that his Government had just supplied a detailed report to the Office on the questions raised by the Committee of Experts concerning: the list of Scheduled Tribes; the reports of the Commissioner for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes; the reservation of seats for tribal populations in local administration; the rehabilitation of displaced tribal people; the National Forest Policy of 1988; the carrying-out of a survey on the extent of alienation of tribal land; and the health and education programmes for the welfare and development of tribal people. As concerned the Sardar Sarova dam and power project, he noted that the World Bank had prescribed certain benchmarks on resettlement and rehabilitation and on environmental aspects of the project, taking into account the issues raised by the independent review. These benchmarks were substantially fulfilled by the Government before the prescribed date. However, in order to avoid further vitiation of the atmosphere, the Government had decided to disengage from the World Bank and not seek any further disbursement out of the outstanding portion of the credit for the project. With respect to rehabilitation, the state Government of Gujarat had exhibited its capability to resettle project-affected persons, depending on their willingness. 5,058 project-affected persons in Madhya Pradesh and Maharashtra and Gujarat States, more than 90 per cent of whom were tribal people, had already been resettled by July 1992. The Government of Gujarat had so far allotted 10,107 hectares of land to these project-affected people. Furthermore, resettlement grants had been given to 1,645 families and subsistence allowance to 3,659 families. Development assistance of Rs. 5,000 per family had been given to 2,645 families. Thirteen rehabilitation sites out of a total of 86 had already been provided with electricity. Employment had been provided to 349 people. A health survey had also been conducted for the preparation of a detailed health programme for the displaced. Details of the steps taken by individual states were included in the report provided to the Office.

The Workers' members stated that they had in the past commented on the problems raised by the construction of the Sardar Sarovar Dam, and generally on World Bank projects throughout the world which often had catastrophic consequences as far as indigenous and tribal populations were concerned. The World Bank and the IMF should consult the ILO before they embarked upon such projects. In this case, this was especially true because although the World Bank had made its decision on technical not political grounds, it nevertheless had the consequence of disturbing thousands, perhaps a million, tribals. Although there was a need for the dam, adequate preparation had not been made to deal with the consequences of the large-scale disturbance of people and the amount of resettlement compensation that was likely to be paid. There was still a gap between the resettlement needs of the tribal populations being displaced and the amount of land available. Thus, the Government was invited to continue to give detailed reports on all aspects of tribal indigenous populations in India since it had one of the largest of these groups in the whole world. Moreover, continual reports were requested on the developments as far as the dam was concerned and on whether the displaced people were receiving adequate compensation.

The Employers' members pointed out that this case had been discussed four times since 1986, and in 1991 the Committee had addressed an urgent request to the Government for detailed replies to its questions. However, regular reporting over the last few years had been extremely inadequate. The dam project was only one example of a general problem that tribal peoples required special protection as stated in the Convention. This protection was necessary since tribes had a different status and should be able to live differently. Up to now adequate responses had not been received from the Government on this subject. Since hundreds of thousands of people had been resettled it was particularly important to know whether compensation was adequate, whether there was enough substitute land for these tribals and where this land was. Much greater clarification was required than had been the case in the past on the resettlement measures. The Employers' members hoped that the report that had been referred to by the Government representative would answer many of these questions so that the Experts could take note of positive changes.

The Committee took note with interest of the detailed information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee regretted that the Government had not sent a report to the Committee of Experts in time for it to be examined during the 1993 meeting of that Committee. The Committee noted that, notwithstanding the earlier discussions on this subject and the repeated examination by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee, it still did not appear that the resettlement and rehabilitation measures for the displaced tribal peoples were in conformity with the Convention. It expressed its deep concern at the fact that the measures for the resettlement of tribal populations displaced in future might give rise to greater difficulties with regard in particular to the Sardar Sarovar Dam and Power Project, the Committee was of the opinion that the Government could examine with the ILO the question of the social impact of this project on the tribal peoples concerned. Consequently, the Committee requested the Government to take urgent measures to bring its resettlement and rehabilitation policies into line with the Convention. In this connection, the Committee recalled that the Government could seek technical assistance from the Office, if it so wished. The Committee expressed the wish to be able to examine this case again next year and hoped to be able to note concrete progress in the harmonization of national law and practice with the provisions of the Convention.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Brazil (ratification: 1965). A Government representative of Brazil recognized the existence in his country of discrimination in employment, whose origins stemmed from the colonial period. The Government was taking particular care in its study of labour statistics in order to detect anomalies. It intended to improve relevant legislative instruments with social participation. He supported an active policy against discrimination and was in favour of equal opportunities in the labour market. The Ministry of Labour was improving statistical analysis of dismissals and was endeavouring to centralize data and to put into place a network for the collection of information on social matters. The Government was concerned about consolidating the social achievements proclaimed by the Constitution, and had proceeded to revise its legislation, in particular on discrimination in employment. He specifically mentioned Bill No. 1045 encouraging employers to hire women, and Bill No. 5291 prohibiting wage discrimination based on sex or pregnancy, the financial incentives given to employers to provide vocational training, the establishment of a fund for the vocational training of women and Bill No. 3032/92 prohibiting the employer from requiring female workers to undergo pregnancy tests. He indicated that these problems had less impact on the public service, as the Constitution stipulated that public service posts were open to all without distinction through public competitions, with 20 per cent of the posts reserved for the physically disabled (Act No. 8112 of December 1990). With regard to the allegations that female workers were required by employers to be sterilized, the Government recognized the existence of a problem but pointed out that, to its knowledge, no complaint about this had been reported. He recalled that Bills Nos. 229/91 and 667/91 prohibited that proof of sterilization be required.

The Employers' members welcomed the recognition by the Government of the existence of a problem of discrimination in employment in the country, as well as measures contemplated to ensure compliance with the Convention, including the collection of more comprehensive labour statistics. This was a starting-point. They had the impression, however, that real employment laws to protect victims of discrimination were still not in place and urged the Government to enact such laws, as well as to create the announced inspectorate under the National Labour Council dealing with occupational discrimination issues. Positive training and education programmes would also be necessary to begin to turn the tide in human orientations to discrimination, including problems of the sterilization of women. The Employers urged the Government to adopt these programmes as soon as possible.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Employers' members. They stressed that the Government should send its comments on the communications received from the trade union organizations, for examination by the Committee of Experts. As regards the question of the sterilization of women, they stated that it should not be used as a means of discriminating against women seeking employment. Laws banning this existed and the Government was making efforts to enforce them, but difficulties persisted. The Workers considered that a campaign should be conducted in this area because the figures showed that a large number of women were involved in the sterilization programme which had an impact on the discrimination in employment.

The Workers' member of Brazil stressed that, while some major progress had been achieved in legislation for the protection of women, in practice some employers continued to require sterilization and marriage certificates before they hired women, and requirements based on sex still existed for certain positions. All workers should realize that the defence of women was not a campaign against men and that all workers had to assist women to defend their interests. She believed that with the structural adjustment policies and the flexibility policies that were being imposed on developing countries resulting in unemployment and recession, the situation, in particular the situation of working women and children, had worsened. More awareness campaigns among employers were necessary to protect working women.

The Workers' member of New Zealand supported the comments made by the Workers' member of Brazil. It was unfortunate that women bore a heavier burden in a recession and that widespread poverty left women seeking work in a desperate situation where forced sterilization was accepted as a precondition to gaining employment or continuing in employment. He noted the indications made by the Government representative that steps were being taken to alter this situation both by enforcement measures and by educational methods. Tripartite efforts were needed to make it clear that such practices were unacceptable to the social partners.

The Government representative stated that, while there were difficulties in proving cases of discrimination as the victims themselves did not complain, they were dealt with by a special unit for monitoring discrimination in employment created under the National Labour Council. This Council, through building a tripartite consensus, would have a significant role to play in ensuring that the Bills which were now before the Congress would be adopted more quickly, so that there would be more effective legal instruments preventing discrimination in Brazil. With respect to the special situation of women, he indicated that more than 100 police officers were especially dealing with women's problems making it easier for complaints to be submitted and for the cases to be investigated and prosecuted.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. In particular, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there had been discrimination over a period of years and that it was now attempting to combat discriminations through an active policy, with the participation of the society and through the National Registry of Social Information and the National Labour Council, and that it had submitted various Bills to that effect, and that statistics were being collected. The Committee also noted that the Government had submitted, among others, a Bill prohibiting women from being compelled to present certificates of sterilization or of pregnancy in order to obtain employment. The Committee was, however, deeply concerned about the situation prevailing in certain private enterprises. It urged the Government to take the necessary measures to prohibit any discrimination based on sex and to reply to the comments of the workers' organizations regarding discrimination in the labour market based on race. The Committee hoped that the replies to the requests for information by the Committee of Experts would be included in the next report of the Government so that it would be possible to take note of the progress achieved with a view to ensuring full compliance with the Convention.

Egypt (ratification: 1960). The Government has communicated the following information:

1. In paragraph 1 of its observation, the Committee of Experts referred to Presidential Decision No. 214 of 1978 and to the two laws adopted in conformity with this decision, namely Act No. 33 of 1978 respecting the protection of the home front and social peace and Act No. 95 of 1980 respecting the protection of values. In reply to these comments supplied, the Government maintains the information supplied in its preceding reply to which the Committee has referred. Furthermore, the Government indicates that the Egyptian legislation authorizes adhesion to any opinion, whether political or religious. Only the call for denying religions, the exercise of an activity prejudicial to the security of the State, the call for use of violent methods or recourse to such methods would be punished. Adhesion to any opinion is entirely authorized. Only the appeal to certain aberrant opinions which are contrary to the fundamental principles of society, established in the Constitution, and the call for violence are forbidden. Any persons against whom a measure is taken in this respect may have recourse to the judiciary. This is in conformity with the letter and the spirit of the Convention.

2. In paragraph 2 of its observation, the Committee of Experts recalls that it has raised the point of incompatibility of section 18 of Act No. 148 of 1980 respecting the power of the press, with the principles of the Convention. In this respect, the Government states that the persons not allowed to publish or to participate in the publication of newspapers are those affected by a ban on the exercise of their political rights or of the right to form political parties, those professing doctrines rejecting the divine laws and persons convicted by the Court of Moral Values.

3. The Committee of Experts has also noted that Act No. 33 of 1978 limited the freedom of publication and distribution by means of the press or other means of information. The Government states that the Egyptian legislation does not forbid any group or person having political or religious opinions to exercise the profession of journalist or to express opinions through a journalist. The prohibition in section 18 of the Act concerned persons against whom final decisions had been handed down. This ban may be considered to be part of the supplementary sanctions which are known in all penal legislation and which aimed at ensuring the integrity of the press, which is not contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Government mentions that section 4 of Act No. 33 of 1978 was declared to be unconstitutional by the Constitutional Tribunal on 21 June 1986 (Case No. 56, judicial year VI; decision published in the Official Journal No. 27 of 3 July 1986).

In addition, a Government representative stated that Presidential Decision No. 214 of 1978 respecting the protection of the home front and social peace had been issued in the context of a basically socialist regime but that since then his country had undertaken structural reforms in order to encourage private initiative and promote a market economy. In the light of recent changes, the Government had undertaken, in collaboration with the ILO, a review of certain laws concerning in particular fundamental freedoms, freedom of association and equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. However, the modification of these aspects of the legislation required time. The Government was trying to guarantee non-discrimination in law as well as in practice in conformity with the Convention. A reply to the 1993 observation of the Committee of Experts had already been supplied to the Office. Reference was also made to the previous responses of the Government.

The Workers' members recalled that Presidential Decision No. 214 excluded persons convicted of maintaining principles contrary to the divine law from senior posts in the public administration and the public sector and also prohibited them from publishing articles or engaging in work that might influence public opinion. According to the Government representative, Egypt was making an earnest effort to cooperate with the ILO and to modify the legislation in order to ensure its conformity with the Convention. Moreover, according to the Government representative, the Government did not apply in practice the provisions and this was contrary to Article 1 of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee of Experts had recalled as usual that the wording of the law also had to be brought into conformity with the Convention. The Government representative was thanked for the good intent which he had shown and the efforts which were promised to eliminate any incompatibilities.

The Employers' members, recalling that this case had already been examined by the Conference Committee in 1991, considered that the restrictions in the domain of employment resulting from provisions which restricted freedom of expression, were of a discriminatory nature which was contrary to the provisions of Article 1 of the Convention. However, the Government had stated that these provisions were incompatible with the Constitution and were not applied in practice. The Committee of Experts had recalled that the expression of religious, philosophical or political views should be allowed in the absence of the use of, or the incitation to, violence. However, this point of view, based on law, raised certain problems which should be reflected on during the examination of this case. Lately there had been an increase in religious extremism which, without explicitly inciting, was by its nature an encouragement to carry out acts of violence. Everybody knew that Egypt had to face acts of terrorism fed by religious and political fanatics and the Government's concerns were understandable. In practice, a balance had to be found so that the necessary protection of freedom of expression did not encourage extremists. Although a delicate task, the Government was earnestly trying to remove the restrictions existing in the legislation and to interpret them so that no political discrimination could take place. It was hoped that the Government would quickly take measures to this end. When the Committee of Experts examined the results obtained through these measures on the basis of a detailed report, this Committee could once again readdress the issue.

The Workers' member of Italy emphasized that the existence of discrimination was contradictory to the powerful tradition of tolerance in Egypt and could only be explained in the international context. By repealing this discriminatory legislation, the traditional spirit of tolerance in Egypt would once again be renewed.

The Government representative specified that the Constitution and the Egyptian laws guaranteed freedom of opinion and equality before the law to all citizens. Only atheist propaganda and recourse to violence were prohibited.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee stated that it shared the opinion of the Committee of Experts that specific measures were required to remove the possibility of discrimination in employment on the basis of religious or political opinions. The Committee expressed the hope that the revision under way of the national legislation would ensure its conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee stated that it hoped that the Committee of Experts would receive information on this subject in the next report of the Government. In particular, the Committee expressed the firm hope that, in the very near future, there would be an amendment to Presidential Decision No. 214 of 1978, to section 18 of Act No. 148 of 1980 with regard to the power of the press, as well as to Act No. 33 of 1978 respecting the protection of the home front, with a view to bringing national law and practice into full conformity with this fundamental Convention. The Committee reminded the Government that it could ask for technical assistance from the Office, if it so wished.

Islamic Republic of Iran (ratification: 1964). A Government representative first made it clear that his Government attached significant importance to the ILO, to international labour standards and to the work of the supervisory machinery. First, regarding discrimination based on religion, he stated that the statutory provisions in the public sector did not permit any discrimination in employment based on conviction, that there had been no case of dismissal based on conviction, and that a complaint on such dismissal, if any, could be filed under section 11 of the Administrative Justice Tribunal Code. As to the pension issue, section 76 of the Social Security Act and the Retirement Act of 1986 provided for age and length of service as the only criteria for eligibility for pension, therefore without any discrimination. He stated that 101 Baha'is were currently receiving pensions and that files in this regard would be submitted for examination. Regarding the question of dismissal, the existing legislative provisions prohibited any dismissal based on conviction, sex, colour, race, ethnic or social origin, and measures for reinstatement by the competent courts and authorities existed in the law. As to the closure of Baha'i businesses, section 39 of the Trades Regulatory Act concerning the closure of business units treated all nationals equally. The Prime Minister's Directive of 1989 had been formally re-endorsed by the President of the Islamic Republic of Iran and practical measures had been taken accordingly, including the non-discrimination concerning Baha'i businesses or education both in schools and universities. He denied the alleged closure of Baha'i classes in January 1991. He also denied the discrimination against the Zoroastrians including the right to conduct business and expressed the Government's willingness to examine any alleged case. He further stated that the circular of the Supreme Revolutionary Cultural Council had never been issued. Regarding point 7 of the comment of the Committee of Experts the document requested would be supplied. As to point 8, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran required the judicial body to arrange courts according to the rites and religious regulations when the issue concerned civil statutes. With regard to Freemasonry, he stated that these organizations had terminated their activities in the country and that any complaint concerning dismissal on the basis of the membership would be received by the Administrative Tribunal. Secondly, regarding the situation of women workers, he provided the latest statistics on women pursuing higher education (3,286 women in a number of engineering and agricultural fields; the four state polytechnic universities had 533, 597, 836 and 557 women students, respectively, of which 34 studied metallurgy, 743 studied in agricultural courses and 559 studied law). He thus denied the alleged sexual discrimination in higher education or in vocational training and stated that the restrictions on women's occupations was meant to protect them from hazardous work. Regarding judges, women could obtain various judicial positions according to their judicial rank without restriction based on sex. He expressed the determination of his Government and the judiciary to promote the participation of women in judicial activities and mentioned the existence of more than 250 women attorneys. Thirdly, as regards general measures concerning equality, he stated that section 6 of the new Labour Code, like its section 38, originated in articles 19 and 20 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran which prohibited any kind of discrimination in employment and occupation. Section 6 of the Labour Code extended the protection of the Labour Code against discrimination on all the grounds set out in Article 1, paragraph 1(a) of the Convention including religion, political opinion and social origin.

The Employers' members first recalled that the case had been discussed in this Committee for many years although there had been interruption for two years, and that it had been included in a special paragraph, sometimes indicating the continued failure to implement. They referred to the legal texts mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report and requested the Government for further clarification concerning, for example, the circular of the Supreme Revolutionary Cultural Council of 25 February 1991 of which the publication and even the existence did not appear evident given the statement of the Government representative, and the directive of the Ministry of Labour of 8 December 1981 which seemed to have been repealed, and the text of which containing the report would be very useful for the work of the Committee of Experts as well as of this Committee. In addition, the Employers' members would be grateful to the Government if it would clarify how the Prime Minister's directive mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report had been regulated or modified, and if it was the case, if it had been repealed. Concerning the situation of women workers, the Employers' members stated that they could not comment on the statistical data supplied by the Government representative which, at first sight, appeared to indicate that women workers were no longer subject to the discrimination raised in the report of the Committee of Experts. They referred to the paragraphs of the Experts' comments regarding general measures concerning equality, and wondered, in light of the Government's statement that the Labour Code responded to all the requirements of the Convention, whether the Code had been amended since the comments of the Experts illustrated divergencies between the two texts. The Employers' members concluded by emphasizing that the attitude of the Government as was demonstrated in the statement of its representative contrasted with those of its predecessors who either denied the facts mentioned by the Committee of Experts or defended their viewpoint by stating that the measures taken by the Government were sufficient to the extent that they conformed with Islamic law, or combined these two attitudes.

The Workers' members appreciated the detailed replies provided by the Government representative, stressing, however, that the replies did not enable them to have a clear idea of the situation. Certain facts mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report – for example, the case of the circular of February 1991 pointed out by the Employers' members – were denied by the Government representative. Nevertheless, they were pleased to see the Government's willingness to supply the relevant information and documents to the Committee of Experts. Concerning the situation of women workers, they stated that the extensive information including statistics supplied by the Government should be examined by the Committee of Experts and be supplemented by separate figures on each economic sector, occupation or other relevant classification. As for point 13 of the above report, they noted that the exceptions only concerned the ban on women workers from carrying heavy loads or being present in dangerous places or other similar cases. They requested the Government to supply particulars in this regard, as well as on the situation of women occupying the highest posts in the judiciary. As regards the general measures concerning equality, the Workers' members also requested the Government to clarify further its indication that the national legislation would be perfectly in line with Article 1, paragraph 1(a) of the Convention. Furthermore, they appreciated the positive signs indicated in point 16 of the Committee of Experts' report. Finally, they hoped to receive more detailed information on the cases examined by the Supreme Labour Council, including examples of some representative cases. The Workers' members concluded by emphasizing that the Committee should remain prudent and insist that the Government should do more, provide more detailed information and intensify the dialogue with the Committee.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that he had difficulty in reconciling the past and present positions of the Government. First, he wondered about the possible change of attitude of the Government towards international labour standards, especially whether to what extent it now considered them universal. Concerning the Baha'is, he recalled that in the past the Government had considered them to be spies and that, according to the statement of the Government representative, they could now receive the pensions which were legally due to them. Regarding the situation of women workers, he requested supplementary information on the Islamic Councils of Labour.

The Workers' member of Germany stated that he would be grateful to the Government for indicating the percentages corresponding to the figures which its representative had mentioned in his statement so that this Committee would be able to assess the situation of women workers. He wanted the Committee of Experts to receive the necessary information concerning the education and further education plan referred to by the Government. Finally, he agreed with the last speaker concerning uncertainty of the universal value of international labour standards for the Government.

The Government representative reaffirmed his Government's willingness to deal with the observations of the Committee of Experts frankly and sincerely. He reiterated the Government's efforts to provide the required information as much as possible including, for example, the copy of the text which endorsed the Prime Minister's directive and the directive of the Ministry of Labour. As regards the Islamic Labour Councils, he stated that the membership of these Councils was not a profession but of an advisory nature and that the philosophy of these Councils was to prepare programmes and establish coordination for the progress of workshops with the participation of workers and employers. He also referred to section 131 of the new Labour Code concerning the right to establish or join workers' or employers' organizations without discrimination. Regarding women workers, he stressed the importance that his Government attached to equality of opportunity between both sexes in the reconstruction and renovation after the war of 1981-89, and referred also to the principle of no wage discrimination based on sex, provided in the Labour Code. He further denied the existence of the circular of the Supreme Revolutionary Cultural Council. He finally referred to the Asian and Pacific Labour Ministers' Conference hosted by the Islamic Republic of Iran as an example of the Government's commitment to the universal standards.

The Committee heard the information submitted by the Government and took note of its statement that it adhered to the principles of the ILO. It also took note of the Government's statement that in the country there had been no discriminatory dismissals, that the social security system applied equally without any discrimination and that religious minorities were treated on an equal footing with nationals. The Government had also indicated that being a Freemason was not punishable by law and that vocational training for women was constantly increasing. Nevertheless, the Committee continued to express its concern because the discrepancies previously pointed out between the law and practice and the Convention had not been removed, as they should have been. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would accomplish the removal of the conditions that constitute discriminatory treatment in the recruitment of members of certain religious groups which had been discussed in this Committee on many occasions and on which no progress seemed to have been made. The Committee also expressed its concern about the situation relating to women workers, in particular, the possibilities of equality as regards recruitment, although there were many women undertaking university studies. The Committee hoped that the next report from the Government would indicate in particular what steps had been taken to annul the circular of the Supreme Revolutionary Cultural Council of 25 February 1991 relating to recruitment of people who belonged to the Baha'i faith and that it would contain information requested by the Committee of Experts on progress made to eliminate restrictions on work by women which had been noted by the Committee of Experts. The Committee trusted that, on the basis of the detailed information announced by the Government, the Committee of Experts and this Committee would be able to note real progress in the very near future on the subjects that had been commented upon by the Committee of Experts.

Iraq (ratification: 1959). A Government representative indicated that the comments of the Committee of Experts had not reached the Government and had been received only upon arrival at the Conference. He stated that the Constitution of 1970 guaranteed to all citizens equality in employment and occupation without any discrimination on the basis of race, religion, social origin or other motives and provided that employment and work were a right established for all citizens. The Civil Service Act of 1960 guaranteed equality in the public sector, without discrimination on the basis of sex, social origin or religion, and the Labour Code of 1987, in section 2, guaranteed the right to employment without discrimination on the same grounds. Different texts were adopted on the basis of the Constitution and the Labour Code in order to create conditions of equality of opportunity and equity in education, employment and working conditions. This policy received the support of the social partners and the Government had done everything possible to give it practical expression in the world of work. Referring in particular to education and vocational training, he stressed that education was free of charge from the age of six, without discrimination based on sex; vocational training centres were open for all citizens; conditions had been created so that everybody was prepared for employment, irrespective of their origin. There was also equality in promotional opportunities. The policy of equality had borne fruit: the number of working women had risen to 39 per cent of the labour force. He concluded that there was full equality for all citizens irrespective of origin, beliefs or religion.

The Employers' members, referring to the statement of the Government representative that the comments of the Committee of Experts had been received late, recalled that these comments corresponded word for word to those formulated previously, as the Committee of Experts had repeated them again this year because the Government had not supplied the report. They noted, in connection with point 2 of the observation, that the Government had not supplied information on the measures taken or on the results obtained to promote the cultural rights of ethnic and linguistic minorities, such as Turkoman and Kurdish minorities. In relation to point 3 and Article 2 of the Convention, they noted that the Committee of Experts had once again requested the Government to supply information on the measures taken to ensure that, in practice, the members of these minorities were not subjected to any discrimination. Given the very general remarks of the Government, they considered it necessary that the Committee urgently request the Government to communicate a report and to provide all necessary information on the concrete measures adopted to ensure the application of the Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had noted in its observation that the Government "merely cited" the provisions of the Constitution and labour legislation, which the Government representative repeated in his statement. The provisions concerning human rights and non-discrimination were found in many constitutions, yet they still had to be applied in practice. The Workers noticed that the Government representative had not mentioned the Turkoman and Kurdish minorities to whom should be added the Arab minorities in southern Iraq, who were being starved and slaughtered in the most extreme form of discrimination. It was evident that discrimination was taking place against ethnic minorities in Iraq. The Convention did not only prohibit discrimination based exclusively on the grounds of sex, social origin or religion, it equally prohibited discrimination for other motives. The Government should supply the information required by the Committee of Experts, as well as by this Committee, concerning minorities.

The Workers' member of Kuwait supported the declaration of the Workers' members and requested information on the measures taken to respect the rights of the Kurdish, Turkoman, Chiite, Assyrian and other minorities. In the Kurdish zones in the northern part of the country, schools had been closed, depriving a large part of the population of their right to education. The Government did not respect its international obligations. It should submit a report indicating measures taken in practice to respect the rights of minorities.

The Government representative stated that he referred not only to the Constitution but also to the Labour Code and to the Civil Service Act, and to the State Plan adopted in 1970 which was contained in mandatory legislation. The legislation did not permit any discrimination and made no distinction on the basis of national origin: Arabs and all ethnic or religious minorities were treated on an equal basis. The Kurdish population was not treated differently because all populations were dealt with on the basis of equality in employment and all other rights. He mentioned Act No. 33 on self-administration of Kurdish regions which provided, in particular, the following: the language of education was Kurdish; the rights of these populations were protected under the Constitution (article 3); all minorities were represented on a proportional basis in the Parliament of the autonomous region; access to public employment was guaranteed; the Parliament of the autonomous region had the right to take all legislative measures to promote the cultural and social development of the region, as well as national customs and traditions of all citizens, including members of the various minorities (article 10); the Executive Council, composed of Kurds and not Arabs, had the authority to administer various fields, such as employment and education (article 10), and to distribute civil service positions among the various members of the minorities. He concluded by stating that the abovementioned laws guaranteed equality of opportunity to all citizens, including the Kurds and other national minorities, and respected international obligations.

The Workers' member of Iraq, recalling the mandate of the Committee, stated that he was taking part in the Committee to monitor the application of ILO standards; he was entirely in favour of the application of this Convention. He stated in general terms that governments were slow in revising their legislative texts and adopting measures to implement them. Referring to the situation in his country, he considered that, because of the embargo, all citizens became victims of certain forms of discrimination and that the northern regions were not suffering from exactions but from the consequences of this measure. He supported the requirement to supply reports and to respect Conventions, if his country was given the means to do so.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that he was aware of the difficulties existing in the country, as were other members of the Committee. However, he wanted to know the measures taken by the Government as well as the results achieved.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee regretted that the Government did not submit the report due in time for it to be examined by the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed its deep concern at the situation of the Kurdish and Turkoman minorities and asked the Government to provide information regarding the situation in practice of these ethnic minorities and on the manner in which equality of opportunity and treatment was ensured for them. The Committee urged the Government in future to comply fully with the obligation to submit reports at the appropriate time, so that the Committee of Experts and this Committee could follow the developments in the situation.

Mauritania (ratification: 1963). A Government representative recalled that the difficulties with respect to this Convention resulted from the painful events that took place in 1989 between Mauritania and Senegal, and he assured the Committee that the normalization of bilateral relations since then had permitted the reinstatement of workers in their employment and their free movement to the satisfaction of both parties. As Mauritania was a country founded in law, every person who considered that their rights had been infringed had the opportunity to appeal. More generally, the Constitution, the Law Respecting Public Service and the Labour Code prohibited any form of discrimination during recruitment or in employment. In the public service, the recruitment on the basis of competition guaranteed equality of opportunity to all Mauritanians without social, ethnic or racial distinction. In the private sector, the requirement of registration on the lists of service of the labour force was the only valid criterion. The Government's social policy aimed at encouraging the persons who were the most under-privileged.

The Workers' members recalled that this case originated in a representation presented by the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal, which resulted in the adoption by the Governing Body of a report recommending that specific measures be taken to determine the nationality of persons displaced and reparation for the prejudice suffered. The Governing Body had asked for a detailed report for 15 October 1991 on the effect given to these recommendations. However, the statement of the Government representative did not allow the Committee to determine what measures had been taken to give effect to these recommendations. Thus, it was appropriate to insist that the Government act quickly as indicated and that it inform the Office of measures taken in practice.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the Workers' members' request that the Government explain the concrete measures taken following the recommendations of the Governing Body. It was not sufficient to state that the reasons for the past events were history. Concrete measures remained necessary, pursuant to which the Government should present a detailed report as soon as possible so that the Committee of Experts would be in a position to examine the situation once again.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the different observations and recommendations. In reply to a question from the Workers' member of Greece, he stated that negotiations between Mauritania and Senegal were going on.

The Committee regretted that the Government had not supplied information on the measures taken to implement the recommendations made by the committee set up by the Governing Body of the ILO to examine the representation presented under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO concerning in particular the employment situation of nationals of Mauritania displaced in 1989 during a conflict with Senegal. Consequently, the Committee urged the Government to do everything possible to award appropriate compensation to the Mauritanian nationals who had suffered prejudice in their employment. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would send a detailed report so that the Committee of Experts and this Committee would be able, in the near future, to note decisive progress towards resolving this problem.

Pakistan (ratification: 1961). A Government representative reiterated that the Constitution of Pakistan guaranteed equal opportunities in all matters including employment and education to every citizen regardless of faith or religion. Article 27 of the Constitution prohibited discrimination in the matter of appointments in the government services of Pakistan on the basis of race, religion, caste, sex, residence or place of birth; and article 36 provided that the State had to safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of minorities, including their due representation in the services of the federal and provincial governments. Members of minority communities had held and were holding high positions in the services of Pakistan. Selection for the civil services and the armed forces was made on the basis of merit, without any discrimination. He reiterated that the Anti-Islamic Activities (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance did not affect members of the Ahmadi/Quadiani community in the matter of employment and education as there was no question of dismissal of any member of this community from service on the basis of religion. The Pakistan Penal Code imposed an obligation on all citizens to respect the religious sentiments of others. Since the Ahmadis and Quadianis were not Moslems, they were prohibited from claiming the contrary. They were, however, free to preach and practise their own faith. As concerned the Committee of Experts' request for statistical information concerning the number and percentage of Ahmadis in the civil services and the armed forces and the number of any dismissed, the Government representative indicated that such information was not collected on the basis of religion and therefore was not available. He concluded by indicating that a detailed report on the application of the Convention would be submitted.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been discussed in this Committee for a number of years and had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1987. They recalled that the Convention addressed direct and indirect discrimination. This case concerned discrimination based on religion. They noted the Government representative's indication that there were some constitutional provisions and some statutes which protected public sector employees from discrimination, but expressed concern that there was no mention of legislation for the protection of private sector employees in this regard. While noting the difficulties involved in dealing with religious discrimination, they pointed out that Ordinance No. XX, which provided that members of minority religious groups could be imprisoned for propagating their faith, represented a basic violation of the Convention. It was difficult to get a job while in jail. While noting the Government's reply that the dismissal of an individual because of his membership in the Ahmadi faith was actually due to other reasons, they pointed out that mixed motives for dismissal only signified that there were problems in the application of the Convention. They also recalled the problems raised with respect to the refusal to issue passports. They concluded by recalling that they were dealing not only with a question of direct discrimination, but also discrimination relating to decisions made in a society that made it difficult for a person to get a job. They urged the Government to make every effort to correct this problem in the near future.

The Workers' members noted a new element in this case: the Government had indicated its intention to exclude the new industrial zones from the labour legislation, including the legislation protecting against discrimination. They recalled that the Finance Act permitted the suspension of labour legislation. They urged the Government to provide all information on any measures taken in this regard. They recalled that Ordinance No. XX provided for punishment with imprisonment of members of certain religious groups for propagating their faith. Obviously, this affected their chances of employment. They also noted that the refusal to issue a passport on the basis of religious belief would have consequences on a person's ability to find employment abroad. The provisions of the Convention did not therefore appear to be fully applied. They concluded by urging the Government to take all necessary measures to eliminate any discrepancies in law or in practice and to guarantee equality of opportunity and treatment. They also urged the Government to provide all necessary information on developments in the situation.

The Government representative repeated that the Constitution prohibited any discrimination on the basis of religion and that there was no discrimination in the labour law. As concerned the issuing of passports, he suggested that this question might be the subject of advice from ILO technical assistance.
